Mr. VAN WYCK. On the 2d of February the Committee on Claims reported adversely on the petition of Margaret Kennedy, executrix of John Kennedy, deceased, praying compensation for damages done to property of the decedent by the military forces during the late war. Since then additional evidence has been obtained, and I desire to have the additional evidence, together with the original petition, resubmitted to the Committee on Claims, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the action heretofore taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves to reconsider the vote by which the Committee on Claims was discharged from the consideration of the petition of Margaret Kennedy for relief. That order will be made if there be no objection, and the papers, with the additional evidence now presented, will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

SILVER DEPOSITS AT SUBTREASURIES.

Mr. EUSTIS. I move to take up the resolution I offered some time ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 168, being the resolution submitted by him on the 8th instant, instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into certain transactions of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans relating to the deposit of standard dollars, &c.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire: First. Whether it has been the custom for the assistant treasurer at New Orleans to receive deposits of standard silver dollars from shippers of said coin and to issue to their correspondents at New Orleans receipts subject to count, and to issue silver certificates after the count of said dollars so deposited has been made; and whether said custom, if it has prevailed, has been changed by the instructions of the Treasurer of the United States, and the reasons therefor; also, whether the said custom is now in force as regards any subtreasury of the United States. Second. Whether there has been, and is now, an adequate clerical force at the subtreasury at New Orleans to perform the duties of that office, so that holders desiring to deposit standard silver dollars, under the authority of law, may deposit them and receive therefor certificates without delay, and if such clerical force is insufficient, to report to the Senate what increase of said force should be made to secure a prompt execution of the law. That said committee are hereby authorized to send for persons and papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was an amendment intended to be proposed to the resolution submitted and printed, but it has not yet been offered formally. The attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is called to the amendment submitted by him and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add to the resolution—

The committee also inquire of and concerning the alleged defalcation in the subtreasury at New Orleans mentioned in the telegram from C. N. Jordan, Treasurer, addressed to Senator CALL, and presented by him to the Senate on the 9th instant, and whether such defalcation was in any wise connected with the exchange of silver dollars for silver certificates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is now in order. The first bill on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. DAWES. The unfinished business is——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no unfinished business in the morning hour. The first bill in order will be stated.

Mr. DAWES. I move to proceed to the consideration of the severalty bill, which was partially considered the other morning, Senate bill 54.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 9, line 3, after the word "Chickasaws," it is proposed to strike out the word "and," and after the word "Seminoles" to insert "and Osages;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That the provisions of this act shall not extend to the reservations of the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Seminoles, and Osages in the Indian Territory, nor to any of the reservations of the Seneca Nation of New York Indians in the State of New York.

Mr. DAWES. I thought that amendment was adopted.

Mr. TELLER. I understood that amendment was accepted by the committee. If not, it ought to be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection. The Secretary has no note of its having been voted on heretofore. It is now agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to what I think to be a contradiction between sections 1 and 2. Section 1 provides—

That in all cases where any tribes or bands of Indians have been or shall hereafter be located upon any reservation created for their use either by virtue of treaty stipulations or an act of Congress, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause a patent to issue for each of such reservations in favor of the tribe or tribes, band or bands, of Indians occupying the same under treaty stipulations or act of Congress.

In section 2 it is provided that this provision in regard to ordering lands to be divided in severalty shall apply to "any reservations created for their use either by treaty stipulations or by virtue of an act of Congress or executive order." I should like to have an explanation of that.

Mr. DAWES. That change in the phraseology was adopted after deliberation, and I think I can satisfy the Senator why. Section 1 provides for the issuing of a tribal patent in cases where the Indians hold their title by treaty or statute title. It was not supposed by the committee possible or wise to include in that provision reservations made by executive order. Reservations by executive order are in the nature of things temporary, and they include sometimes vast tracts of lands which there is no propriety in giving a tribe any tribal patent for. But when you come to the second section, it proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to take individual Indians as well those upon the treaty and statute reservations as those upon reservations established by executive order, and set them out upon land in severalty just as fast in his opinion as these individual Indians are competent and desire to take this land and support themselves.

An executive-order reservation is public land set apart temporarily for an Indian reservation; and, if upon such a reservation there are Indians so far advanced in civilization as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior to be able to support themselves upon land in severalty, he is authorized by the second section to take them upon this public land and give them their 160 acres in severalty. That is why the authority in the second section is broader than that in the first section.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me that the statement of the case made by the Senator from Massachusetts indicates clearly that this distinction should not exist. If there is any purpose in connection with the awarding of land in severalty it is to enable and in fact to require the Indian to make a living upon that land and to make his home there. Now, to put him upon land which has been set apart by executive order, and which the Senator from Massachusetts says furnishes only a temporary provision, to induce him to go on that land to make a home, build a house, plow the land, cultivate it, and yet provide no means of giving him title, is to put him in the way of not only a very great disappointment but of a very great injustice.

Mr. DAWES. Let me call the Senator's attention. I misunderstand this bill, if when the Indian is put on lands in severalty under the second section he does not get a patent. Under a subsequent part of the bill the United States is to give him a patent, by which the United States covenants to hold for him for twenty-five years in trust this particular 160 acres, and at the end of twenty-five years to give him or his heirs a patent in fee.

Mr. PLUMB. It does not seem to me that that applies. If it does, it is a ratification now, by act of Congress, of all the acts of the Executive in setting aside by order the bounds of Indian reservations. This is doing hap-hazard what I think ought not to be done except after the utmost consideration. I know of several reservations which have been set apart by executive order which I think ought not to be parceled out among the Indians now occupying the lands. One of them which I have in my mind is the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation, in the Indian Territory. It is true that the President is supposed to have some discretion lodged with him under this bill; but it will be observed that it is a very wide one. If the land is fit for agriculture or for grazing it is to be parceled out. That practically describes every single reservation set apart by executive order in the United States. The President may, if he finds that the land is fit for grazing, set it apart for the Indians, as well as land fit for agriculture. We shall then have the spectacle of Indians being allotted a small quantity of land upon which they are expected to make a living and on which it is impossible that they shall make a living. There would be no sense in allotting to an Indian grazing land with a view to his making a living upon it, because he would not have enough, under the provisions of this bill, to make a living upon. He can not live on 160 acres or 240 acres of land suitable only for grazing. Thus we should be confronted with the same difficulty we are confronted with now in regard to some Indians who have located on reservations on the northern line of the country, where there is no possibility that the Indians will ever make a single effective step toward becoming self-supporting.

This question was discussed at the last session of Congress under a proposition to increase the appropriation for the support of a tribe of Indians having a reservation on the Canadian border. It was agreed then, as I think by common consent—I certainly think the Senator from Massachusetts agreed to it—that those Indians should be removed from that reservation; and yet here we are providing that the President shall set apart in severalty those lands to the Indians when we know that they are not fit for any human occupancy, at least to the extent of furnishing a livelihood for any considerable number of people. I shall move therefore to strike out the words "or executive order setting apart the same for their use," in section 2, lines 4 and 5.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kansas has failed to understand the scope of this bill. It puts in the power of the President and the Secretary of the Interior in reference to the executive-order reservations simply this:

Whenever in his opinion any reservation of such Indians or any part thereof is suitable and advantageous for agricultural or grazing purposes, and the progress in civilization of the tribe located thereon, or any of the members thereof, shall be such as to encourage the belief that an allotment of lands in severalty to the members of said tribe, or any of them, would be for the best interests of said Indians, to cause said reservation, or such parts thereof as in his opinion are suitable and advantageous for agricultural or grazing purposes, to be surveyed, or resurveyed if necessary.

And then it prescribes that he may allot to such Indian 160 acres and hold in trust for him for twenty-five years that particular 160 acres. It applies, to begin with, only to such lands as are in his opinion suitable.

Mr. PLUMB. For what?

Mr. DAWES. For agricultural or grazing purposes, to which he proposes to put the Indian whom he finds to have been so far advanced in civilization as to give reasonable hope that he can maintain himself upon that land. Further on in the bill it also authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to take up all three of these classes of reservations, the treaty reservation, the statute reservation, and the executive-order reservation, and by negotiation or otherwise to reduce the limits and open up to the public all those parts of those reservations not necessary for the purpose of maintaining upon the reservation such of these Indians as in his opinion he can not wisely put out upon the land. It does not consolidate or fix in a statute at all the present limits of any executive-order reservation; it leaves them just where they were before; but it clothes the Secretary of the Interior with a power he has not had to individualize all Indians as fast as he can, to treat them not as tribes but as individuals as fast as it is possible, in the progress of their development.

If this language is stricken out, then we shall have one process of dealing with the Indians upon treaty and statute reservations, and another process of dealing with those upon executive-order reservations. If it is stricken out, you can not take a single Indian upon an executive-order reservation and put him out in severalty. You must confine this whole process to those few reservations that are held by treaty and by statute, but all that vast number of Indians, three-fourths of them all, or half of them at least, who are now upon executive-order reservations will be without the benefits of this statute.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question, if he will consent.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. MANDERSON. I recall to his mind the fact that simply for purposes of protecting the Sioux Indians from the sale of liquor in close proximity to their reservation there was laid out in the State of Nebraska, contiguous to and immediately south of the Sioux reservation, a strip of land 10 miles long and 5 miles wide. The Senator is familiar with that fact. I ask him whether he thinks that strip of land laid out simply by executive order for that purpose should come under the provisions of this bill and be occupied in severalty by the Sioux tribe?

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly not; and as I understand it under the letter it does not apply to it.

Mr. MANDERSON. Does it in spirit?

Mr. DAWES. It is only Indians that are occupying the land, and therefore no Indians occupying that little strip.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think there are some Indians on that strip.

Mr. DAWES. It is only such Indians as in the opinion of the Secretary are so far advanced as to maintain themselves, and it is only such land as the Secretary of the Interior in his opinion finds proper to place those Indians upon.

Mr. MANDERSON. Would the Senator from Massachusetts have any objection to excepting that strip of land by specific language?

Mr. DAWES. Not the slightest if there is any apprehension that it could apply, because I understand, just as the Senator does, that that is a mere police regulation, and I have not the slightest idea of grasping in it into executive-order reservations.

I supposed that the bill would make a very great advance in the reduction of all reservations, treaty, statute, and executive-order reservations, because for the first time it clothes our officials with power to take up each one of these reservations, and, in the light of the present day, and of the present condition of the Indians and of the soil, to cut it down to present necessities. All that, by the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, will be stricken out of this bill, and this will be a bill only to treat with the Indians upon the treaty and statute reservations. I trust, therefore, that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, line 4, after the word "Congress," it is proposed to strike out "or executive order setting apart the same for their use."

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question as to what he understands to be the effect of the second section, whether it is to give the Indian tribe the title to the whole executive-order reservation they occupy?

Mr. DAWES. The change of phraseology between the first and second sections was for the very purpose of excluding the conclusion suggested by the Senator. If the present language of the bill is maintained, the tribal title will apply only to treaty and statute reservations and will not extend to any executive-order reservation. There will not be any authority, as I understand the bill, and I think it is clear, in anybody to give to any tribe of Indians any patent to any executive-order reservation, but there will be authority to take individual Indians in such cases and give them 160 acres each with a qualified patent.

Mr. TELLER. And throw the rest open to settlement.

Mr. DAWES. And throw the rest open to settlement just as fast as the Secretary of the Interior shall be able to do that consistent with the needs of the Indians.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move to strike out the words "or grazing," in line 8 of section 2.

There is no use in giving power to the President which he can not exercise in a beneficial way; and he can not locate Indians on grazing land in such a way as to enable them to become self-supporting. It must be agricultural land, on which they can raise a crop.

While, of course, I do not want to come between the Senator from Massachusetts and his great solicitude about the Indian, I do not want that we shall go on in the way we have heretofore, locating them on reservations where they can not earn a living, and therefore I think if we are to deposit them in some place where we expect them to stay and make homes we should put them on land where they can make a support.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], in section 2, line 8, after the word "agricultural," to strike out "or grazing."

Mr. DAWES. If the Indian can not be made to support himself on the grazing land, then the Secretary of the Interior will not plant him on it. But there is a great extent of territory, half of which is grazing land and part of which is agricultural land; and a wise arrangement of this matter would be to give the Indians who have an inclination to raise cattle a small portion of agricultural land and a larger portion of grazing land connected with it, sufficient for each Indian not only to maintain himself but to encourage him and his family to make themselves independent. That manner of treating the Indian is provided for in several bills that have passed here without objection, and it has been considered in the administration of affairs at the Indian Bureau as a very marked and wise provision.

Now, if you are going to confine the Indian to farming only, you cripple and you destroy the opportunity of the Indian on very many reservations. You take that vast reservation upon the British border of 30,000 square miles, and the last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says there are but ten acres of it all under cultivation. There can not be up there much farming in the ordinary sense of the word, but it is a magnificent grazing country, and a small portion of the rivers reaching up among the valleys and the mountains for grazing purposes may be a very valuable acquisition for the Indian. But if this is to be confined to farming lands suited for what are ordinarily called agricultural purposes it will cripple the honest and earnest efforts of the present as well as of the past administration of Indian affairs in trying to lift the Indian up to take care of himself and lift off from this Government the great burden of more than $5,000,000 every year for his support.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. I invite the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to section 11 of this bill. It appears to me to be inconsistent and superfluous. The first clause declares—

SEC. 11. That the provisions of this act, except those relating to the issue of tribal patents, shall not extend to any tribe of Indians as such until the consent of two-thirds of the male members twenty-one years of age shall be first had and obtained.

The second clause continues—

Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, make allotment of land in severalty as hereinbefore provided to any one or more Indians, members of a tribe or band, upon the request of such Indian or Indians, irrespective of the action of such tribe or band; and when allotment of land shall be made to any Indian the head of a family, allotment shall be made to the members of such family as hereinbefore provided in cases where division is made among the members of an entire tribe or band.

All that is contained in the proviso extending from line 5 to line 13 is already provided for; that is to say, under section 2 individual members can be provided for by the action of the President; and therefore, when you declare in the first clause that nothing shall be done except in pursuance of the consent of two-thirds of the members of the tribe, and then afterward assert that any individual member, and so on up to the entire number, may do exactly as the President sees fit, it seems to me the section is inconsistent, and I suggest to the Senator to omit that clause from the bill.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, it is not essential to the operation of the bill that that clause should remain; but the meaning of it is perfectly plain to me. When it provides that the whole tribe shall not be under this bill, except with its consent, and goes on further to declare that notwithstanding that provision, that prohibition, that limitation shall not go to the extent of preventing the President from taking individual members of that tribe and giving them lands in severalty, it is plain that the object of the proviso is to save to individual members of the tribe the operations of the first and second sections. The first and second sections do provide just what is in the proviso.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator will permit me one moment there. This does not refer to the first section. This expressly excludes the first section by its terms. The first section relates to the issue of a tribal patent; therefore the first paragraph of this section has no reference whatever to section 1; this relates solely to section 2, which refers to the issue of patents in severalty to individual Indians who may wish to withdraw from the tribe.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator fails to observe that section 2 embraces the treaty titles, the statute titles, and the executive-order reservation titles; and therefore any prohibition contained in the first part of that section might be construed as applying to executive-order reservation Indians were it not for the proviso; but the bill would work without that, and I am so anxious to get the real issue here, which is to clothe the Secretary of the Interior with power to individualize all the Indians, that if the Senator desires to make a motion to that effect I shall not oppose it.

Mr. INGALLS. I think it had better be amended. I move to amend the bill by striking out section 11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That the provisions of this act, except those relating to the issue of tribal patents, shall not extend to any tribe of Indians as such until the consent of two-thirds of the male members twenty-one years of age shall be first had and obtained: Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, make allotment of land in severalty as hereinbefore provided to any one or more Indians, members of a tribe or band, upon the request of such Indian or Indians, irrespective of the action of such tribe or band; and when allotment of land shall be made to any Indian the head of a family, allotment shall be made to the members of such family as hereinbefore provided in cases where division is made among the members of an entire tribe or band.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. In section 7, beginning with the word "and" on line 8, I move to strike out from that word "and" down to the words "United States," in line 19, and ask that the words be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out in section 7, after the word "law," in line 8, all down to and including the words "United States," in line 19, at the end of the section, as follows:

And every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States to whom allotments shall have been made under the provisions of this act, and every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States who has voluntarily taken up, within said limits, his residence separate and apart from any tribe of Indians therein, and has adopted the habits of civilized life, is hereby declared to be a citizen of the United States, and is entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such citizens, whether said Indian has been or not, by birth or otherwise, a member of any tribe of Indians within the territorial limits of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. There has been an amendment added to that clause since the print of the bill. Perhaps the Senator would like to have that included, if it is in order.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not know what the amendment is.

Mr. DAWES. There has been an amendment to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment already made will be read.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to hear it.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment was to add to the section:

Without in any manner impairing or otherwise affecting the right of any such Indian to tribal or any other property.

Mr. MAXEY. That does not change the point I wish to make. The lines I propose to strike out will inaugurate a new policy in this Government. I wish to say in the beginning that no man is more in favor of the general doctrine of placing the lands for the Indians in separate parcels and giving to each head of a family and each single man who desires to work for himself a home of his own. I believe in that principle because it is the way to start a people in the direction of civilization. I believe that is a wise policy. But here before this new policy has been tested, before we can see what is to be the practical effect of the policy, whether the Indians will be benefited or injured by that policy, we propose to make them citizens of the United States.

In my opinion that is a dangerous starting-course; and so regarding it, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs I reserved the right to object to it. Let us endeavor to see what we can do with these Indians by giving them separate homes; let us see what we can do when we destroy the old aboriginal idea of chiefship, and make every man among the Indians understand that he is to obey the laws of the land like other people; that he is to make his living like other people; that he can no longer depend upon this Government to support him in idleness; that the system of herding Indians on reservations to lie idle and be provided for by the Government is to cease, and that each individual Indian is to be required, like any other human being, to earn his living by the sweat of his face. Let us try that policy. This bill inaugurates that policy. This bill has passed the Senate twice, I believe, under the leadership of my colleague [Mr. COKE], inaugurating that policy; but the bill which we passed heretofore did not contain this provision; it is a new provision. Now, to show that it is not well guarded, let me read the bill, for I think this applies to Indians on the reservations, and to them alone. You will find by the ninth section—

That the provision of this act shall not extend to the reservations of the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Seminoles, in the Indian Territory, nor to any of the reservations of the Seneca Nation of New York Indians in the State of New York.

If there are any Indians in this broad land who are capable of citizenship they are excluded by the terms of the bill. We take men who have no knowledge of our language, no knowledge whatever of our laws, and we confer upon those men suddenly, and without preparation, the highest boon that can be conferred on mortal man, that of American citizenship.

Mr. President, we have had enough, in recent days, of trouble in this country on such matters. Let us get through with what we have already in that way. We are doing our very best to benefit the colored race who have been made citizens of the country; and those who are most deeply interested in the success of that movement are doing all they can do with their means to make them qualified for the exercise of the rights of citizenship. But here these people, not knowing our language, never having associated with our white people, never having had opportunity of seeing how civilized people conduct their affairs and organize society, are proposed to be made in one day citizens of the United States in case they live on a separate tract of land. Why, Mr. President, by the very theory of our Constitution a person born abroad and coming here, no matter how educated that man may be, must pass a specified time (five years as now fixed by law) before he is entitled to the rights of citizenship. But here are people who but a few years ago were wild tribes roaming upon the prairies, engaged in raiding upon the settlements of the white people with the tomahawk and scalping-knife; we have gathered them up into reservations; and now, because we put them on separate tracts of land, we are to say to them, "You may become citizens of the United States." It is too soon. I do not say, and I do not wish to be understood as saying, that the time may not come when I would favor the extension of citizenship to them; but I want first to educate them up to that standard.

I agree with what was said by the Senator from Massachusetts in this regard. You must begin the civilization and education of the Indian, as was said once by a distinguished citizen of the United States, one who understood him as well as any man ever did, the Senator who occupies the chair [Mr. SHERMAN], by first making him learn how to raise stock. You must follow the old rule that is laid down by the Bible. Let him begin by raising stock; begin by herding. After a while he will be prepared to go to farming; then after a while he will be prepared to go into mechanical pursuits, and so on step by step. Educate the Indians in that way in the practical affairs of life while their children are being educated in schools and prepared, and thus you have a preparation made for this great boon of American citizenship. Being deeply impressed with that, I oppose this provision of the bill.

The Senator from Massachusetts knows the Indians pretty well, and I know them very well. If there are any who are qualified for citizenship it would be the very ones who are not made citizens by this bill, the five civilized tribes, as they are called, and the Seneca Nation of New York. I am not acquainted with the latter, but with the five civilized tribes I am; and if any Indians are fitted for citizenship they have been for years, many of them for fifty years; indeed the tribal relation in some instances was broken up longer ago than that. They have been raising stock, have been farming, have homes, each one for himself. They have no chiefship. They elect their legislature and their governor, and every one has to provide for himself by his own industry. That is their system. They have been going on in that way, and they are doing very well. They are having schools, they are having high schools, neighborhood schools, and various graded schools. In that way they are endeavoring to prepare the rising generation for citizenship.

When we were out in the Indian Territory last summer they showed us in that very connection that when they shall be brought into the Union as citizens they desire to understand our laws, to speak our language, and to live on terms of equality in all matters relating to the country. They told us that a large portion of their people did not understand our language, and therefore they were not prepared for this. They are right in that, in my opinion, and for that reason I have moved to strike out these words. I think the words ought not to be there, and have not been in any similar bill heretofore.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the attention of the Senate can be drawn to this amendment and that it understands what is proposed in the bill if the amendment shall not prevail. It is to make citizens of the United States of those Indians and those only who have taken allotments under this bill, and those born within the United States who have taken up their residence separate and apart from any tribe of Indians therein and have adopted the habits of civilized life. Such a person is the Indian whom it is proposed to make a citizen of the United States; and we do it in order to encourage any Indian who has started upon the life of a civilized man and is making the effort to be one of the body-politic in which he lives, giving the encouragement that if he so maintains himself he shall be a citizen of the United States.

We have declared in a constitutional amendment that every man born within the territorial limits of the United States thereby becomes a citizen of the United States. The Supreme Court has said that an Indian tribe on a reservation is outside, for these purposes, of the territorial limits of the United States; but without criticising that decision, the policy of the United States has been ever since the adoption of that amendment to the Constitution to take every man born within the limits of the United States and clothe him with United States citizenship, giving him all the advantages of the protection of our laws and an appeal to our courts for his protection, whether he has adopted the mode and manner of civilized life or not. He may be a poor African; though born within the limits of the United States, he may in all things else be like an African born on the coast of Africa; he may have no one of what we may deem to be the qualifications of citizenship except the fact that he is a man and has in him that out of which a man can be made; but before he has acquired these qualifications, the Constitution of the United States says that if he has been born within the limits of the United States, without regard to his condition of life, he shall be a citizen.

In the case of an Indian who has left his tribe, turned his back upon the savage life, has adopted the modes and habits of civilized life, is in all respects like one of us, why shall he not be a citizen of the United States, while the poor and degraded and ignorant African, with no better qualifications than if he were imported from the Congo coast, merely because he is born here, may be a citizen? I do not see the reason for the distinction. I think it is safe to say that every Indian who has adopted our mode of life and lives among us as we live can be a citizen of the United States. It is safe; and it is time when we have extended the protection of citizenship to everybody else that we extend it to such an Indian.

The Senator from Texas says it is a new policy. He is quite mistaken. For fifty years we have provided in treaty and in statute that every Indian who took an allotment of land should thereby become a citizen of the United States. We so provided in all those treaties which were made in 1867 by the commission then sent out, beginning with the Sioux treaty; and the provision in the Sioux treaty runs through them all. After having provided for Indians taking land in severalty, that treaty says:

And any Indian or Indians receiving a patent for land under the foregoing provisions shall thereby and from thenceforth become and be a citizen of the United States, and be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of such citizens, and shall at the same time retain all his rights to benefits accruing to Indians under this treaty.

Very many Indians under all those treaties made that year have taken lands in severalty and are by virtue of those provisions to-day citizens of the United States. Can any one tell us any good reason why if they should be citizens of the United States Indians taking land in severalty under this bill should not be? And then, sir, the same provision was made long ago in the treaties of 1817 and 1835 with the Cherokees, and in 1820, 1825, and 1830 with the Choctaws (7 Stat., 159, 211, 236, 335, 483, 488; Wilson vs. Wall, 6 Wallace, 83; Opinion of Attorney-General Taney, 2 Opinions of Attorneys-General, 462); in 1855 with the Wyandotts (10 Stat., 1159; Karrahoo vs. Adams, 1 Dillon, 344, 346; Gray, vs. Coffman, 3 Dillon, 393; Hicks vs. Butrick, 3 Dillon, 413); in 1861 and in March, 1866, with the Pottawatomies (12 Stat., 1192; 14 Stat., 763); in 1862 with the Ottawas (12 Stat., 1237) and the Kickapoos (13 Stat., 624); and acts of Congress of March 3, 1839, chapter 83, section 7, concerning the Brothertown Indians, and of March 3, 1843, chapter 101, section 7, August 6, 1846, chapter 88, and March 3, 1865, chapter 127, section 4, concerning the Stockbridge Indians (5 Stat., 351, 647; 9 Stat., 55; 13 Stat., 562). See also treaties with the Stockbridge Indians in 1848 and 1856 (9 Stat., 955; 11 Stat., 667; 7 Opinions of Attorneys-General, 746).

Running through all these treaties and statutes are provisions that Indians taking land under them shall thereby become citizens of the United States; so if this provision be stricken out of this bill we shall have two classes of Indians occupying land in all respects in the same manner, holding the same title, occupying the same position in the community, part of whom are citizens of the United States and part of whom are not. I fail to see why a distinction should be made against an Indian who has, in the language of this bill, taken upon himself all the attributes of a citizen, who is living the life of a citizen, who is certainly as intelligent, as capable mentally and morally as a vast body of our citizens are to discharge any of the duties incumbent upon a citizen of the United States and not incumbent upon him as an individual resident of the United States, if there are any other duties devolving upon a man as a citizen of the United States that do not devolve upon any resident of the United States while here. If there are any such duties I do not know what they are; I know there are privileges of citizenship, but the duties required at the hands of a citizen of the United States by the laws of the United States are required also at the hands of every resident of the United States while here, but a resident of the United States not a citizen has no standing in our courts. This gives the Indian holding land in severalty a place in the United States courts to vindicate his right to his land and protect himself in the enjoyment of his land. He is a different order of being, holds a different status in the United States from the Indian living with a tribe; and the Indian who has taken land in severalty under the statutes and treaties that I have cited holds a different status from the white man or the colored man. The colored man was a slave but yesterday; he has been made to-day by a constitutional amendment a citizen of the United States, and not only a citizen of the United States but a citizen of the State in which he lives. This bill does not undertake to make an Indian the citizen of any State, but it gives him citizenship of the United States and a status in the courts of the United States.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, I send to the desk and request to have read the address of J. L. McDonald, a Choctaw. I ask for the reading of the part I have marked with pencil.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper sent up by the Senator from Rhode Island will be read if there be no objection.

An address from a delegation of Choctaw Indians to Congress in 1825.

J. L. McDonald, a Choctaw and the writer of the subjoined address, was when quite a youth adopted into the family of Hon. Thomas L. McKinny, at that time chief of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Under the instruction of Rev. Dr. Carnahan, afterward president of Princeton College, his rare intellectual powers developed in so marked a degree that Mr. Calhoun, Secretary of War, proposed that he be made a lawyer. This suggestion was acted upon, and in half the usual time devoted to the study of this profession he had mastered it and was qualified for the bar. At this crisis in his history a letter came from his people telling him "he had one of two things to do—either throw away all that belonged to the white race and turn Indian, or quit being Indian and turn white man. The first you can do; the last it is not in your power to do. The white man will never permit the Indian to come into close fellowship with him or share his prerogatives or advantages."

From this moment Mr. McDonald was oppressed by the despotism of his destiny, and when subsequently during the practice of his profession in Mississippi his overtures of marriage were scornfully rejected by a townswoman he felt his social ostracism to be so hopeless and complete that he ended his unfortunate life.

It was during a brief visit to the Choctaw country that he was chosen by his tribe to accompany a delegation of the chiefs to Washington, whose course he so eloquently pleads below.

WASHINGTON, February 18, 1825.

To the Congress of the United States:

As representatives of the Choctaw Nation, and in part of the aborigines of this country, we feel ourselves impelled alike by duty and by inclination to address you at the present crisis. The Indians are becoming objects of increasing interest among your people. Sympathy is felt for their condition, and the most benevolent exertions have been and continue to be made to improve and civilize them. Under such circumstances we can not refrain from giving an expression of our feelings with regard to our condition and prospects. You are an assembly which we have been taught to consider the most august in the world, and into whose hands are committed the destinies of our people. To whom, then, could we more properly address ourselves on the great points connected with our happiness and prosperity?

Our good father the President has spoken to you and requested you to adopt some measures to improve the condition of the Indian race. He has recommended that all the Indians east of the Mississippi be persuaded to remove and establish themselves to the west, that a certain form of government be provided for them, and that the land to which they may remove be secured to them forever.

Of the policy and practicability of the measure we will not now express a decided opinion; time alone can determine. Of the motives which prompted the recommendation we entertain no question. The opinion expressed by the President that under no pretense should the Indians be forcibly removed from the lands which they occupy gives us an assurance that his feelings are truly paternal toward us. That opinion accords with the sentiment entertained by all just and reflecting men, and can not, therefore, fail to be responded to by your honorable body.

We have long been sensible of our weakness, and we know that should the Government of the United States rise in hostility against us we must inevitably be exterminated or driven to the West. We know that the extensive country which you now possess once belonged to our forefathers. We have heard that from a small beginning you have grown to be a great and powerful people, and that as you advanced we receded, as you flourished we decayed. We have been tempted to ask, Why should this be so? Has the Great Spirit frowned upon His red children that they should thus have withered in your presence? Yet we have been told from the good book that He loves all His children alike and that His greatest attribute is that of infinite mercy. This we are most willing to believe, and believing we are led to the natural conclusion that for some great end only known to Himself He has permitted us to melt before you, but that the time must come when His interposing hand will be outstretched in our behalf and we be made to become like white men.

We rejoice to think that that period is approaching. The voice of the President, the sentiments of philanthropy which seem to pervade the people, the schools and religious institutions which have been established among us—all give us the consoling assurance that we are not doomed to extinction. We have become sensible that one great reason of the power and prosperity with which our white brothers are so eminently favored has been the general diffusion of literature and the arts of civilized life among them. You have institutions to promote and disseminate the knowled[illegible] of every branch of science; you have a government, and you have laws all [illegible]nded upon those principles of liberty and equality which have ever been dear to us; for in all our vicissitudes of fortune, and notwithstanding the constant and gradual diminution of our numbers, we have never been the slaves of any power, and we trust in the Great Spirit we never shall be. The theory of your Government is: justice and good faith to all men. You will not submit to injury from one party because it is powerful, nor will you oppress another because it is weak. Impressed with that persuasion, we are confident that our rights will be respected.

We have but small tracts of territory remaining and our numbers are comparatively few. The majority of those east of the Mississippi are turning their attention to agriculture, are settling themselves, and would in time become useful citizens. We admit at the same time that a large number still continue a wandering life, are wretched and degraded. These it would give us pleasure to see settled west of the Mississippi. It would be better for them and better for those who remain. But you can not persuade all to remove. The gradual operation of the law which you may enact with regard to this subject would probably effect much. But there are those whom the strongest inducements could scarcely persuade to leave the land which contains the bones of their fathers, and which has been rendered dear to them by the recollections of youth. The important question then presents itself, what will you do with those that remain? What measures will you adopt to improve their condition, to promote their happiness? It is this great point to which our address is intended principally to direct your attention.

As connected with the subject and with the question just proposed, we are constrained to say that in several of the Southern States we are denied privileges to which as members of the human family we are of right entitled. However qualified by education we may be, we are neither permitted to hold offices nor to give our testimony in courts of justice, although our dearest rights may be at stake. Can this be a correct policy? Is it just? Is it humane? When schools are multiplying among us, when we have made liberal appropriations of money for the education of our children, when we are forsaking the chase and turned our attention to agriculture, and are becoming an orderly and social people, does it comport with an enlightened and liberal policy to continue the imposition of those degrading restrictions upon us? Should not inducements be held forth to our young men to qualify themselves to become useful citizens of your Republic? Should not the portals of honorable distinction be thrown open to them as well as to their white brothers? But the subject is a painful one, and we will dismiss it. The mist of prejudice is gradually vanishing before the light of reason and enlarged sentiments of philanthropy begin to prevail. We leave the issue of the question to your wisdom and to the liberality of the South.

In conclusion, we would express the earnest hope that the result of your deliberations respecting our unfortunate race may be such as to insure durable benefits to them and lasting credit in the eyes of posterity to yourselves.

Mr. CHACE. That memorial is dated in 1825. I think it bears in itself internal evidence that the writer of such a document was surely fit to enjoy the rights and privileges of citizenship.

I confess that I am at a loss to understand how gentlemen reconcile to themselves and to their own sense of right and justice that anomalous condition that the people of the United States have occupied so long toward the Indian tribes. How with our system of laws, based as it is upon the Declaration of Independence, which announces "that all men are created equal," that they are endowed "with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," this people can go on generation after generation holding in subjection this handful of a race of men, possessing as I hold within themselves elements which might under proper cultivation go to make up the very best class of citizens, I am at a loss to understand.

As this memorial says, our Government is based upon the immutable principles of justice; but how are we meting it out? Let us not forget that the great sin of slavery had to be washed out in a sea of blood and at the cost of untold treasure; and I take this opportunity to declare here my solemn belief that unless the American people amend their wrongful course against the red man the nation will be punished again for its sin in this regard.

There are some two hundred and sixty-five thousand Indians in this country. Surely this is a very small morsel to be assimilated among the sixty millions, guarded and protected as the process would be under the eleventh section of this bill, which it is proposed to strike out. The provisions are very ample. These Indians are not to receive the rights of citizenship until they shall have settled themselves upon their allotted land, until they shall have separated themselves from their tribal relations, until they shall have taken up their residence separate and apart from the tribe and adopted the habits of civilized life.

What greater guarantee can we have of their fitness for citizenship than that? And what malign prejudices, what influence is it, what strange, peculiar influence is it, which can operate upon the mind of any gentleman to prevent him from supporting such a provision as that? As the Senator from Massachusetts has said, it is no new provision. It is simply providing that this shall apply to all those Indians now who shall take the precautionary steps here provided.

We are receiving by immigration into this country each year from three hundred and fifty thousand to seven hundred thousand immigrants from foreign lands. We apply to them no such conditions precedent to citizenship. Those men come from any country save one or two; they land on our shores and declare their intention of becoming citizens. We do not ask whether their previous condition in life has fitted them for the rights of citizenship. Here we have a race of people who occupied this country before we came here, who possess under our declaration these rights now; and upon what principle do we debar them from their exercise?

Again, on the score of economy we have gone on year after year spending millions fighting the Indian; we are spending every year hundreds of thousands of dollars to educate him. We find that this policy has not been a success. We seem to forget the one vital and important point, and that is that in order to be rid of this problem, in order that it may be settled, we must put it in the way to settle itself, and it can only settle itself by giving the Indian that greatest and best, yes, the only weapon of defense, the ballot, with the rights of citizenship, the right to sue and defend in the courts.

I claim, then, that on the score of justice, on the score of constitutional obligation, on the score of our obligations to humanity, and on the score of economy as a pure matter of finance, and as the only and quickest method of settling this vexed problem of the Indian, we must make such a provision as this.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has referred to various treaties, beginning with the treaty of 1825 with the Choctaws providing that they might be citizens. Now, the fact is within the knowledge of the Senator from Massachusetts that from 1825, at which time they were east of the Mississippi River, up to the present time they have never yet divided their lands in severalty. Why? They fear becoming citizens of the United States; and why? Because if their country is inhabited by citizens of the United States, if they become citizens of the United States, then the Territory within which they will live will be governed by Congress, and finally their Territory will be taken into the Union as a State, and the citizens of all other States will have the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States; and they believe (and they talk so in their councils everywhere) that when thus their country is opened under the Constitution to settlement by citizens of the United States they will be practically despoiled of their country. The Seminoles, Creeks, and Cherokees, which are regarded as among the most enlightened of all the Indian nations, have never yet availed themselves of the privilege of citizenship by dividing their lands in severalty.

So much for that. I come now to the claim that the fourteenth amendment makes all Indians citizens. If that made them all citizens it would make them citizens irrespective of whether they were in a tribe or out of a tribe, whether they held their land in severalty or altogether, or had no land at all. If the fourteenth amendment made every one born within the limits of the United States a citizen, that would settle the question without the slightest regard to whether he held land in severalty or not. But the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Elk vs. Wilkins, in 112 United States Reports, has settled that question and settled it conclusively. I read from the syllabus, and only regret that I have not time to read the whole opinion, which was well considered and elaborate.

An Indian, born a member of one of the Indian tribes within the United States, which still exists and is recognized as a tribe by the Government of the United States, who has voluntarily separated himself from his tribe and taken up his residence among the white citizens of a State, but who has not been naturalized, or taxed, or recognized as a citizen, either by the United States or by the State, is not a citizen of the United States within the meaning of the first section of the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution.

A petition alleging that the plaintiff is an Indian, and was born within the United States, and has severed his tribal relation to the Indian tribes, and fully and completely surrendered himself to the jurisdiction of the United States, and still so continues subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, and is a bona fide resident of the State of Nebraska and city of Omaha, does not show that he is a citizen of the United States under the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution. (Elk vs. Wilkins, 112 U. S. Reports, page 94.)

It comes back at last to the proposition which I made as to this new departure, for that is what it is. We are told that the privilege was given to Indians to become citizens by severing their lands sixty years ago; and how many in the length and breadth of this great country since 1825 to the present time have ever availed themselves of that privilege? In the five civilized tribes, the most enlightened of all the Indians, not one has ever availed himself of this privilege; but you pass them all by, you pass by the Indians best qualified to become citizens, specially except them out of the operation of this bill, and make the Indian who but a few years ago with the scalping-knife and the tomahawk was attacking the people on the frontier, by the simple act of taking a piece of land in severalty a citizen of the United States, without any knowledge of our laws; and you say that is the rule.

If that is the rule, amend the naturalization laws as to the wild, savage negro that the Senator spoke of who was brought from Africa to this land. Can he become a citizen of the United States under the statutes as they now exist to-day? Look at your Chinamen; are they not specially excepted from the naturalization laws?

The policy of the United States Government when they liberated the slaves was first to make them citizens, and in order to protect that citizenship to give them the right of voting and holding office. That was it, and why? Because they were not isolated, they were not dissociated, they were not separated from the white citizens of this country; but they were mixed among them, they were our neighbors. As long as we and our descendants of the white race shall live in this country, just that long will the colored man and his descendants live in this country, and their fortunes, their destinies will run side by side with ours.

Whether it was wise to begin at once, as we did, or to make them undergo a probation, is a question in the past not now necessary to be discussed. That was the policy, that these people being made free should be intrusted with the rights of citizenship for protection, and to-day throughout all the country where the great mass of these people live the white people of those States are doing all in their power to educate the colored people and make them qualified for citizenship. You may say what you please about the people of the South, they have common sense, and their common sense teaches them that so long as the colored people live among them the better educated the colored man is the more he respects himself, the better citizen he makes, and the better it will be for both colored and white. Therefore it is that under the constitution—and it is a constitutional provision in my State—we have conceded to the colored child his pro rata of the school fund precisely as the white child, no difference whatever. We educate the different races in separate schools, but all the advantages of that magnificent school fund which the white child has the colored child alike has.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and the Chair must lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. DAWES. Let the Senator from Texas complete his remarks.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to finish what I was going on to say.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not object to the Senator from Texas completing his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Texas be allowed to complete his remarks.

Mr. BLAIR. I object, unless we can have some understanding as to the length of time, for it is very desirable to complete the education bill, if possible, to-day. Of course I would not object to any such time as five or ten minutes.

Mr. MAXEY. I want no more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. Let the unfinished business be laid before the Senate, and then it may be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been laid before the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. I am obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire for his courtesy, and I assure him that I will not trespass upon it.

The decision of the case to which I have referred, of Elk vs. Wilkins, gives a very correct and a very interesting history of all the efforts to make citizens out of an unprepared people like the Indians. The court lays down the proposition distinctly that although born within the limits of the United States, when a member of a tribe, an Indian does not thereby become a natural-born citizen of the United States, and that by some process either of naturalization or act of Congress he has to become a citizen. That is the proposition laid down by the Supreme Court; but the point which I make—and I beg Senators to pay some regard to it—is that you must take these people by the hand and build them up step by step. You can not build Indian civilization up by beginning at the top of the ascent and building downward. You must begin at the bottom and build upward. If you ever have a permanent Indian civilization, I believe the true policy will be to divide their land in severalty. That I believe to be right. Teach them to rely upon their own exertions for a living like white people. Teach them that they must be amenable to the laws like white people and colored people are, and that the United States have determined that from this point henceforth and forever the labor of the white man and the colored man shall not be made tributary to the support and maintenance of the Indian in idleness, but that the Indian must be prepared to go on under great sacrifices and secure his living by his own exertions.

Begin there and bring him along step by step and you will prepare him, and I hope in not a very great length of time, for citizenship. There are Indians now in the schools; those children are being taught the English language. They do not teach them the Indian tongue. They say they want to prepare the children so that they can talk the white man's language, read the white man's books, study the white man's laws, and in the great battle of life be able to protect themselves. But so long as they can not do that, so long as they speak a different tongue, so long as they do not know our laws, so long as they are left in that helpless condition they are not prepared for citizenship. They are not like the colored man, I beg to say. The colored man speaks the English tongue. Many of us were born and reared with colored people from childhood up, and all understand the same language; everybody of our race can understand what they mean; they speak the English language, and therefore they were in a condition at the very beginning, so far as that was concerned, to be prepared for citizenship, and they had associated all their lifetime with white people, had seen their manners, habits, customs, and their methods of carrying on their courts and their civil affairs; but these people have not had any of those privileges, and yet you propose to place upon them without preparation the great toga of American citizenship!

Mr. President, I have spoken earnestly about this because I believe in the policy of the bill with this exception.

Mr. MANDERSON. As I expect to be absent on the next two legislative days, when the bill may be concluded, I desire to ask action on an amendment, if I can have unanimous consent. It is agreed to by the Senator in charge of the bill, and it will take but a moment, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to present for consideration an amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that the amendment will not lead to debate, and I consent to action upon it with that understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of section 9:

Nor to that strip of territory in the State of Nebraska adjoining the Sioux reservation on the south, added by executive order, which shall be withheld from Indian settlement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to this amendment?

Mr. DAWES. Let the words "which shall be withheld from Indian settlement" be stricken out.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. What became of the amendment I offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is pending. This was done by unanimous consent. The Chair will take this opportunity to lay before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 16th instant, a statement of the number of suits in the United States courts in the eastern district of Virginia; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me for a moment. I ask leave at this time to report from the Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress the bill (S. 61) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library. It is the bill introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], and is reported from the committee without amendment. I ask that it be put on the Calendar, and give notice that at as early a day as possible I shall call it up and see what we can do toward removing the disgrace on the country growing out of the failure to furnish accommodations for the Library of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the unfinished business be now proceeded with.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MORGAN, to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That the money that shall be appropriated in pursuance of this act for the purposes of education in the Territories shall be apportioned according to a census that shall be taken in each of the organized Territories at the expense of the United States and under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior on or before the 1st day of June, 1885.

Mr. BLAIR. On the pending question the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] has the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from New York yield to me? I was unavoidably detained from the Senate this morning when resolutions were in order, and I ask that the resolution which I send to the desk be read and printed and to lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BLAIR. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire objects. The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] has the floor on the pending amendment.

Mr. EVARTS. Before opening any remarks I may offer to-day, I beg to send to the Chair an amendment to be read for information to the bill now pending. It is an amendment to be added to line 18 of section 1 as it has been already amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add to section 1 as amended:

And if any State by its Legislature shall decline or relinquish its share or proportion under this bill, or any portion thereof, the sum so relinquished shall go to increase the amount for distribution among the other States and the Territories as herein provided.

Mr. EVARTS. This amendment, as I have proposed it, I think meets with the concurrence of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. EVARTS. As might be inferred, Mr. President, from an observation I made yesterday upon taking the floor, I am heartily in favor of the passage of this bill, and I desire to place no impediment, even by consumption of time in addressing the Senate, in the way of its passage. But for some reasons I have thought that it was hardly suitable, from certain relations I have held to the subject in my capacity as a citizen to this topic, to let the occasion pass without saying something affirmatively in favor of the bill.

It will have been noticed in the earlier discussions of this bill, at previous sessions of the Senate as well as now, that the trustees of the Peabody fund had brought to the attention of the two Houses of Congress, by a memorial prepared by that body, a report of a committee that had investigated the whole subject and had produced with some form and precision the conclusions, both in matter of constitutional law and of the public interests that should govern this subject. That report, prepared by a very eminent citizen, experienced in public affairs and universally respected in the State of Virginia, Mr. Stuart, received a careful examination from the Chief-Justice of the United States and myself in the preparation of that paper; and as it presents as its conclusion the affirmance on my part of the correctness of those opinions in matter of law and of the great public interests that are involved, it is quite suitable, it seems to me, that I should now in this place and with such authority as I may command, by a vote which I possess in the Senate, avow an adherence and maintenance of and a defense against all imputations upon those principles which have been or are to be presented here.

The wise benevolence of a very distinguished business man, wholly unconnected with politics but by the large interests and varied experience concerning them in all matters interesting to the United States—I mean the late Mr. Peabody—had at the very outset of the process of reconstruction, seen that education, education first and last, education universal, education under difficulties, education where it was most indispensable, was the first step toward a rearrangement of the ordinary working of the suffrage and of all the movements of political society that were necessary in consequence of the change, so deep, so wide, so thorough, that had been accomplished by the transactions and the determination of the civil war. Out of his private fortune, and with a contribution seemingly but trivial toward so great a labor and to aid so great a result, he undertook to apply what was a princely donation to the very purpose and end that is comprised and is to be accomplished by this bill. There was placed at the disposal of his trustees an income at first of a million dollars and afterward of an additional million; and that was, as we conceived in our application and our estimate of the service that was to be furnished by its use, nothing but as it were a diffusive stimulant that in this great but inert mass could be moved on all that were concerned, on scholars, on teachers, on public men, on statesmen, on States themselves—an element stimulant to activity and encouraging, that should show lightwould come adequate to diffuse itself through the immense darkness.

Fortunate we were in securing as a general agent one of the best instructed and one of the most even-tempered agents of this benefaction, the late Dr. Sears, who was through many years of his life spared to this service. He had gained throughout the South, from those in official life and in all classes of society, in all instructors, whether in official positions or in the ordinary employments of that function, and with scholars as well and the masses of the people, an absolute confidence equivalent in the service of this great benefaction of Mr. Peabody to what his own munificence had attracted from their homage.

Soon it became evident that there was no limit to the benefits which might be accomplished by the methods that Mr. Peabody had placed at our service except the poverty of that fund; that if there had been at our disposal even large revenues they could have been used at the initial stage, and then in progress as the appetite was fed for knowledge and the appreciation of its benefits in the largest considerations that can affect any community that looks at it. There was no limit whatever in the benefits that we could apply if we could have had an enlargement of funds that more truly would meet the vastness of the receptive power of the mass to be enlightened.

As then this matter went on, we saw not only a manifestation of hunger and thirst for knowledge on the part of the ignorant masses, but of zeal, of favor, of activity on the part of those who did not need to share in its bounty except in their perception of the general advantage that would flow from its diffusion; and as we were satisfied not only of a positive but a permanent purpose on the part of the people of the South to seek for and supply their needs out of this source of bounty and of light, so all communities recognized the fact that any interception, any interruption, any perversion not only of the funds that we distributed but of all that were called forth in aid, in supply, in support of this movement were thoroughly, were carefully looked at in communities to which our attention was directed.

It was early a conclusion on the part of the members of this trust that there was no fair reason to doubt that if, from whatever source, there should be placed aid at the service of those States who were plunged into a burden of education and were in the midst of the direst necessity of education, it would be nursed, would be cherished, would be developed, would be faithfully applied. I desire, therefore, here upon this point, to say that I have no misgivings as to the fidelity of the application in the States that in consequence of the results of the war are needing more immediately and more painfully aids in diffused education; that I have no lack of confidence, no distrust as to there being any perversion of the funds that are to be placed at their disposal.

Having this view and there being before the Senate a bill that had been prepared at previous sessions of Congress, had passed through review here, and had received the assent of a great majority of the Senators on each side in political opinions, and it having now and again been reviewed, presented to the Senate, submitted to amendments, now subject to amendments, I can not but say distinctly that I regard this bill as upon the same basis of wisdom and of charity that directed the benevolent mind of Mr. Peabody in the devotion of his fortune to this great object. My experience—and in that I express the united opinion of every member of that trust—induces me to feel that the moneys which shall be devoted under this bill will reap the results and benefits for the communities in which they are to be used that have been derived under the somewhat trivial means that we could command in their aid.

If that be so, then I have no occasion to consider here any question but that of constitutional power and of the wisdom of the distribution of the fund that is provided in the bill. I do not propose to enter any large province of constitutional discussion. As I have watched the debate I have thought that, in the objections which have been made on the other side of this Chamber, the discrimination of what is there regarded as constitutional and that which is objected to as extra-constitutional is upon a very narrow line of division. I am not one of those who attribute to the preamble of the Constitution any affirmative source of means, or of powers, or of methods; but as I believe the fathers of the Constitution who framed the preamble, and those who discussed it upon one side and the other at different stages of constitutional progress as the matter came under debate, all agreed that it was a grave, deliberate, well-measured, comprehensive preamble, and that it was not meant for rhetoric, but was meant for the introduction of the Government that they were founding, and which they described as a constitution; that it was to show that that constitution was proposed by its means and through its methods to accomplish what were conceived great and controlling purposes.

Let us look for a moment at this brief and yet this simple preamble and see whether in the history of any great transactions of our race there has been more compressed and more carefully weighed and weighted in and with meaning than this preamble. What is the motive and what the object of all this transaction that was to make a new nation, that was to make a new government? It was not in any one of its elements, in any one of its words, connected with a trivial, or a temporary, or a limited subject of consideration:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Before you proceed into the clauses and set forms of the Constitution you are in advance prepared to meet in every part of it a full, complete appreciation of that object and purpose that led to the subsequent portions named in the Constitution. You do not expect to find anything therein that is conducive to anything less important than those great purposes. You do not expect to find inside of the clauses of the Constitution anything that is calculated to pervert or to frustrate any of those great propositions.

While, then, I agree that whatever follows in the articles and clauses of the Constitution we can not enlarge its area or deny the force of any of its restrictions, yet we have a right to understand that all the clauses and all the restrictions are supposed by the framers of this Constitution to point one way, and that way is that pointed out in the preamble. Then, as I think, the general constitutional opinion is, and should be, that although this preamble can not enlarge the means that are placed at the disposal of the Government, although it can not disparage or pervert any of the restrictions contained in it, yet we are able to say that whatever is found in the Constitution, from one end of it to the other, in regard to all the means that are put at the disposal of the Government, there is a right to use them in the manner of the preamble, and that in regard to the methods by which they are to be exercised those means are not to be reduced in their methods, except in what is in methods denied to the powers.

This is the sole topic, as I understand, of constitutional debate upon the other side. It is supposed that this bill would not be any violation of the constitutional powers on the subject if this measure were confined to the proceeds of public lands, either under the first gifts of the original States or as they have been acquired by conquest and treaty since that time. I do not wish to misrepresent the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], but I understand that if this fund now existed and could be reached by the sales of public lands, not only that source of means to be used, but the objects to which it was to be applied (I do not refer now to methods and precise qualifications or arrangements), would meet with his approval. That I may not be misunderstood, and that I may do him justice in this behalf, I ask attention to a portion of the Senator's remarks as reported in the RECORD on page 1341, in the second column:

> Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator if he has not introduced a bill here and voted for it donating a considerable sum of money to a college or university in Alabama for replacing the buildings which were destroyed during the war?
> Mr. MORGAN. The Senator has got a great many vain imaginations about me, Mr. President. No, I did not. I introduced a bill, voted for it, and carried it too, to apply the public lands, a trust fund in our hands, for that purpose; and I promise the Senator, if he will do me the honor to listen to me when I come to that branch of the subject, to convince him I think that we have power to do that, and in doing it we do not transgress any feature of the Constitution.

And on page 1433, in the second column, the Senator from Alabama, speaking of the property in public lands, proceeds to say:

> This ownership of the soil is property of the United States which the Constitution expressly empowers Congress to dispose of. It is property to which there is annexed a use, by contract, which Congress should respect far more than it has done. That use could not be better executed than to apply the lands or their proceeds to the education of the people, nor can better agents be found than the States, to all of whom, as States, the beneficial interest in the lands is expressly reserved—reserved not to the people of the different States, but reserved to the States.

As the Senator from Alabama not only in his discussion of this subject but on all occasions when legal distinctions are drawn purposes to speak with precision and force I wish to ask the attention of the Senate very briefly to this discrimination that is made between the public lands as an estate in the United States and a trust impressed upon it as property and ownership, and what I shall present as the true view, as I regard it, of the clause respecting taxation, if we are to apply to constitutions the strict notions of law, sometimes not inapplicable but always valuable, if they proceed upon the general wisdom of the law rather than mere technicalities, as upon this distinction that is attempted to be made between an estate, as he says, in the lands upon which a trust is imposed, and the power of taxation.

In my judgment all constitutional lawyers ought to agree that all the powers named in the clauses of the Constitution are what are called by lawyers, if we are to speak thus precisely, trust powers. There is no power here that is for the benefit of anybody except the beneficiaries of the Constitution, the same people who framed the Constitution, for whom it was made, by whom it is conducted, and for whom all these trust powers are created; and they are defrauded when any one of those trust powers is withheld from the exigencies that might be met from an exercise of those powers.

Where shall we find any closer or more definite proposition in regard to the trusts imposed upon the public lands, upon this property which the United States holds in estate and subject to trust, than that which is included in the various clauses, perhaps with some variation, that have been quoted in the different instruments which have created, if you please, this trust estate? Is there anything anywhere in them but what amounts to this, and to nothing more, that they are so held or they are so vested for the common benefit of all the States? Then the learned Senator from Alabama finds in that estate and in that trust a right to take those lands in the form that they shall be liquidated into money to accomplish the end—not only a constitutional power but a beneficial use, too much, too often neglected; and that he would favor in having the application made. Let me ask attention to the trust power that is found in taxation, and see what its terms are, and what its proper construction should be: excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and

We will take this by the strict constructions of the lawyers, and we have a trust power. The power is unlimited, except as to the subjects to be resorted to for revenue and the methods there described; but the amounts derived by those methods are raised only for one purpose under a trust power, the large scale of governmental application to this trust power that is thus described, and that trust power is "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

Now, can the learned Senator, can any of the ingenious lawyers on the other side, draw a distinction in regard to the terms of the trust, between that laid on the estate of land for the common benefit and that laid upon this power for raising the revenues of the Government, to use them not for the common benefit of the United States but "for the common defense and general welfare of the United States?" I, myself, can draw no such distinction. I am willing that the old debate should be renewed as to strict construction; I am willing that the people should think that nothing can be done at the right time and in the right way, and leave everything to be rectified and redressed by neglects, and done then by powers and means that sacrifice and ruin while at the same time they accomplish a final result.

I should like to know how and why this Government escapes from its obligation under this Constitution to apply the efficacy and the means provided by this trust power to the general welfare as well as to the common defense of the United States. I can not think that if this matter were subject to judicial construction any court or any forensic debater could make a point as to the difference between "common benefit" and "general welfare," except it must be in favor of the taxing clause rather than of the estate furnished by the land investments.

Mr. President, I have said all I desire to say upon that subject, for I believe both in the observations of the Senator from Alabama and of the two Senators from Texas, the constitutional propositions are limited to that discrimination, and the whole play and force of the argument is made to apply only to that discrimination.

Now, is there anything latitudinarian in that treatment of the trust and of the power that is given in order to sustain and execute the trust? What was the power of taxation given for in any of its parts, in any of its applications, in any of its results? What was it deposited in the Congress of the United States for, except that its means, its resources, its faculties, its revenues should all be used to pay the debts—that was for the past—and for the common defense and general welfare, for all future debts would arise undoubtedly as a part of common defense and general welfare.

Where, then, do we find a right to withdraw from an application of these proceeds of taxation and employment of these revenues thus derived, if it be true in the opinions of the Senate, in the opinions of the public, in the needs of the people, that this very situation in the affairs of this nation is the one that most needs to be cared for in reference to the common defense and general welfare of the United States? Is it to build a fort in Boston Harbor or in the New York Narrows; is it to open by the jetties the flow of the mouths of the Mississippi River? Is that more instant, is that more national, is that more necessary, is that more universal than this which we need to provide for the situation produced by the greatest transaction that has happened in civilization, the changed condition of the people of this country?

I agree that if Senators on this side and on the other think that the object is not a good one, that it does not come within general welfare, they should discard this measure that is for their action. Taking the bill by and large, through and through, with all the defects that may be imputed to it by any one, and with the shortcomings that all will lament, not in the frame of the bill but in the efficacy of any measure they can adopt which will adequately provide and accomplish speedily, peremptorily, and conclusively all the results that we would like, does it not conduce to the purpose of this clause of the Constitution? If gentlemen are ready to say that this nation does confront now both a public necessity and a public duty in this provision for the purposes that this bill proposes, then the "ands" and the "ifs" and the "buts" must all disappear. If it is constitutional and if it is necessary it is inexorable in its demands, it must be met by the best means, by the best wisdom, by the best cautions and adaptations that can be resorted to; but never turn from a defect that you can not supply because you omit the whole necessity and leave this mass of ignorance that this bill is proposed to penetrate and permeate and animate with knowledge and with life in all the interest of the United States—let such vote for this bill.

I believe even a narrower constitutional proposition has been raised, and that is that it might be within the constitutional power after money had been raised by taxation and was lying in the Treasury, that then it would not be unconstitutional to devote it; but that to devote the unreceived and uncollected and unlevied revenues that are accessible under this trust power would be unconstitutional. In other words, if the $77,000,000 were at our disposal for the draft to draw out from the Treasury the means, that might be constitutional, because that would be an application of property the whole of it already reduced to possession; but that if we provide that the revenues as they shall occur shall furnish sufficient means for the timely and appropriate and adequate use, that would be unconstitutional because that is exerting the taxing power beyond the means.

Well, Mr. President, it is constitutional to devote the last dollar in the Treasury to the purposes of this bill, and then it is constitutional by your next taxation to raise the money that is necessary to supply the void which has thus been created. I do not know of any court of equity that I have known, open to the large consideration of trust obligations, which would draw a distinction of that kind. But whenever the subject of taxation comes up and the means thus sought to be made and the applications are thought to be beyond the purposes to which they should be usefully or can be constitutionally applied, we are always alarmed by the enormous stretch and reach and authority of this principle, this faculty of taxation.

Did not the framers of this Constitution know what the power to tax meant? Where did they repose the protection of themselves and their posterity in the enjoyment of liberty that it was proposed to defend and perpetuate by this Constitution? Where did they rest it? They rested it in the representation proceeding from the people that were to be taxed. That is the constitutional limitation upon excess of taxation, upon exhaustive taxation, upon any of the encroachments upon liberty and happiness through the processes of taxation. When they gave the taxing powers under the Constitution they were not carelessly deposited, they were not carelessly left open. They knew that the power to tax was the power to destroy. They knew it as well as one of their great contemporaries, the great Chief-Justice of the United States, knew it when he said that the power to create is the power to preserve, and the power to tax is the power to destroy. There you have it all over your Constitution; and whom are you going to destroy? You are to destroy the interests of the people of the United States, all of whom furnish the basis of suffrage out of which your power is to come. There are reasons enough why public men are exposed to diminution of authority by rivalries of every kind, whether they are true to their duties to the Government and to the people or not, but no man needs ever to fear the exercise of the taxing power unless it has been for measures and with results that are not for the benefit of the people in their own intelligence of what they regard as their interests.

Now, then, in a word, Mr. President, I confront this immense, this dangerous, this growing, this threatening mass of ignorance. I find a deliberate, a concerted, a thoughtful, a valuable measure. I might have preferred this or that means; I might have liked to look in the face the very situation that has been produced by the transaction of the war and apply the abundant resources of a renovated and restored Constitution and people to scatter now with as large and liberal a hand as was the power with which it asserted itself to produce that result, also for the common defense and the general welfare.

If it be that in constitutional view an equal and general distribution upon some great basis that shall apply to all the States of the Union is a better method for securing the result of its becoming a law and being useful, or if it be that not on constitutional grounds the support of the representatives of the people of the United States in the two Houses of Congress finds it more in accordance with their public duty as representatives that this shall be the area upon which revenue is to be raised, and this the area upon which it is to be distributed and employed, then I am for a measure that can constitutionally and by adequate support in the two Houses of Congress be made an operative measure, rather than to criticise a dead, inanimate, exhausted, frustrated measure which has failed of passage perhaps by my endeavor to make some wounds in this mantle of charity that is extended now.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I am one of many millions of American people to regret that one of our greatest American lawyers, soon after his advent into the Senate, has found it necessary, in order to support a measure to which his affection seems to be strongly drawn, to declare in favor of the absolutism of Congress. That Senator has declared here to-day that after all there is really no restraint in the Constitution upon the power of taxation as it shall be voted by the two Houses of Congress except the trust that the people are expected to repose and will repose in their representatives. The honorable Senator with a very fine hand has chiseled away upon the distinctions between the powers of Congress and the rights of the people, until he has merged them into one beautiful, symmetrical nonentity. The distinctions are now broken down by this honorable artist in the constitutional law, and hereafter the Congress of the United States has but one question to ask itself, Do we determine in our supreme will that the measure proposed is for the general welfare? Upon that we vote "ay." Do we determine that in support of that measure we shall tax the people? The vote is "ay." Do we determine, if we choose to do it, that we shall vote to tax the people unto destruction? The vote is "ay." And these three propositions are the summary, the substance, the full effect of the statement made by the honorable Senator from New York here to-day as to the absolutism of Congress.

I for one, sir, dread the absolutism of any legislative power. I have seen it exerted in Great Britain through history, now for many years, where they profess to have a constitution not all written, but so established in the traditions of that country and by declarations of their Parliament as that it is scarcely to be mistaken. But the power of the Parliament has been increasing from year to year, and especially in the house of commons, where the people have a representation direct from themselves, until the house of commons has seized almost every power in the British Government and has almost exterminated a great and splendid people just across the channel. Great Britain is to-day writhing in anguish in reference to her public affairs, and the wisest men in all that great realm are confused almost into insanity by the terrible problem which they are trying to unsolve, every particle of which has grown out of this doctrine that the honorable Senator from New York advocates on this floor to-day, the absolutism of the legislative power.

Ireland to-day would have been a prosperous and beautiful land, and those patriotic sons who have been driven from her green isle to seek a refuge in this country, without property and in humiliation and in the face even of social ostracism—those brave men would to-day have been noble subjects of the British Kingdom but for the fact that the Parliament of Great Britain, assuming to itself from time to time this power of absolutism over their destinies, has crushed them and ruined them, I am afraid, beyond recovery.

The Senator has conceded in favor of the rights of the people that they shall at least have a representation. What becomes of the people in the Territories of the United States and in that vast region of country which was a Territory where they have no representation that is entitled to vote in either of these Houses? If the power of Congress is an absolute power of taxation according to its will and its discretion, what is to prevent the Congress of the United States from taxing the people in the Territories without representation and in the exercise of its absolute power? Nothing.

The Senator also undertook to illustrate his argument in favor of this power of Congress to tax the people at its will and pleasure for such purposes as it might determine were within the general welfare by attempting to draw a comparison or analogy or some strength from a position which I took upon the floor with respect to the public lands in favor of the power of Congress to tax the people at its will and to execute what he called a power held in trust. The honorable Senator has not forgotten, though he may not care to remember and recall the fact, that the Constitution of the United States came from the people and not from the States; that the lands which were transferred to the possession of the Government and to its control and ownership sub modo and subject to a trust came from the States and not from the people. Perhaps if the honorable Senator will consult the source of those powers he will be able to discriminate more clearly between the value of those powers that are derived from the people and the value of the rights of property which come from the States.

When the convention which adopted the Constitution of the United States was about to adjourn, a resolution was adopted, after a good deal of debate, that that Constitution should be submitted to the people of the several States in their conventions. They all had Legislatures, and a proposition was made in the convention that this Constitution should be ratified or rejected by the Legislatures of the different States. The convention refused to take that course. Hence it was that the Legislature in each of the thirteen States provided for the organization of a convention to be chosen by the people, and that convention, after being thus endowed with power by the Legislature to act in an organic and legal form as the representative of the people of the respective States, ratified this Constitution, and never went back to the Legislature with it to see whether the Legislature would approve it or not. So that in every source of authority this Constitution came fresh from the people without the intervention of any State Legislature or the State in its organic form in any manner whatsoever. Then the powers that are lodged in this Constitution came from the people of the United States and not from the States, and when those people put limitations, if they did put any at all after all in this Constitution, it was for the preservation of their individual liberties man by man, and not State by State.

When the Congress of the United States undertakes to tax the humblest citizen of this country for the purpose of raising revenue for any cause whatsoever, that citizen has thrown around him in the Constitution of the United States the personal guarantees operating not in behalf of his State, but in behalf of himself as an American citizen, that Congress shall not exercise that power over him. In that fact comes the great strength and beauty and nobility of that character which we call American citizenship. Yes, sir; the American citizen in the Constitution of our country is protected even more than the American State, and almost every guarantee in this Constitution has its operation upon the citizen. Of what is he a citizen? Of his State and also of the United States. He holds a relation of allegiance both to that government which we call his State and to this Government which we call the United States—a double allegiance.

His State represents him in certain functions. This Government represents him in certain other functions. His State tries him for his life if he commits a murder; his State protects his property by its immediate agents thrown around him. The Government of the United States protects him abroad and protects him in any State that he may visit, protects him in all the rights guaranteed to every citizen of the United States. But the two governments in their effect and in their relation and their operation on citizens of the United States and citizens of the State operate by different machinery for different purposes to accomplish different ends. He has the benefit of two governments.

Now, here is a citizen of the United States, properly so called, amenable to the laws of the United States, to its customs laws, to its internal-revenue laws, to its laws for the collection of any tax that the Government of the United States imposes. His State can not interfere to protect him, his State can not say a word about the operation or the execution of those laws. Whom is he left to? To his own representatives from his own State? They may not have the power to protect him or the will to do it. Have we put that citizen of the United States in such an unfortunate and unprotected category as that he has no power left to him to protect himself with, except the mercy of people who reside in other States and represent other communities? Certainly not.

Suppose that we should determine that for the benefit of the general welfare of this country we should enrich and strengthen the great commercial mart and metropolis of this country by giving to it two-thirds of the revenues of the United States for its own private advantage, the city of New York; we have the right to do it because we say that is for the general welfare—no limitation in behalf of the people against that outrageous appropriation and diversion of money to private purposes or to local municipal purposes. What is a man in Alabama or Arizona or Alaska or California to do in a case of that kind? Must he appeal to the representatives of other States, including the honorable Senator with his great powers who wants this act passed, we will say? No, sir; he can go to the body of the written Constitution of the United States, and he can say to Congress, "In the name of the Constitution and of God also, whom you have consulted and addressed when you swore before Him that you would maintain it, do not allow the Congress of the United States to vote that the general welfare of the country requires that two-thirds of the revenues which are received through New York shall be retained there for the benefit of the municipal government, and that that revenue shall be collected from all the quarters of the country."

No, Mr. President, no matter what gloss may be put upon this subject, there is no such absurdity as that in this instrument. The American people were never blind enough to intrust into the hands of any parliamentary body all their liberties to that extent. These men when they ordained this Constitution and voted for it in these conventions, were fresh from the battlefields of the Revolution, and they knew that those battles were fought because of the power of taxation exercised over them by Great Britain who claimed the right to tax them. And yet the honorable Senator is unable to find in his metaphysical disquisition upon words in this Constitution that that great hope of the people of this country embodied in this instrument that they should hereafter be protected against the tyranny of taxation, was all lost in the fact that they confided everything into the hands of their representatives, and that without restraint!

The honorable Senator refers to the case of the opening of the mouth of the Mississippi and other expenditures by the Congress of the United States in opening harbors and rivers, and still others in respect of the building of forts. The honorable Senator knows that the power under which Congress has always claimed the right to open the rivers and the harbors is the commerce clause in the Constitution, where an express power is given to regulate commerce. I do not believe that that is the source, but I believe it comes from the fact that the States themselves when they came into the Union by unanimous consent yielded up in favor of the people of all the States into the hands of the United States the right of navigation in the navigable waters, and that the United States having thus acquired the right to control navigation in the navigable waters become correspondingly in duty bound to protect the navigation and to see that it is kept free.

But whether it comes from the commerce clause, or whether it comes from the navigation cession made by the States to the Federal Union, still in neither case is there the slightest analogy between that express power conferred upon Congress to make these appropriations and that broad power claimed here to exercise an absolute discretion not only as to the amount of taxation but also as to the field of taxation. The distinctions are too plain. We have fancied that we had seen them here for many, many years before the arrival of the honorable Senator from New York, and our fathers who made this Constitution had fancied that they saw them before that honorable Senator was born. These distinctions are not to be thus blended by the art of debate or of argumentation.

I observed, however, that the Senator from New York in his discussion this morning omitted to throw any weight at least in his argument upon this language, "the general welfare of the United States." That is in the body of the Constitution, whereas in the preamble of the Constitution the language is, "promote the general welfare." That means, of course, the general welfare of the people; but when they came to putting a restraint and a limitation upon the taxing power in the Constitution they limited Congress to the right to levy taxes for the common defense, the payment of the public debt, and the general welfare of the United States.

I call the attention of the Senate to the distinction between the citizenship of a man of the State and of the United States. Need I call its attention to the distinction between the States of the American Union considered as such and the United States Government? We have now thirty-eight organized State governments in the Union, and we have got one United States Government. When the power of taxation was given here the term "United States," "for the benefit of the United States," meant for the benefit of the Government of the United States as contradistinguished from the government of the States. When you come to tax the people to promote the welfare of the Government of the United States, you have limitations upon you. You look at the powers of the Government of the United States; you ascertain what they include and what they exclude; and whatever power you find included in the Government of the United States by an express grant, or by a necessary implication from a grant contained in this instrument, you can tax for that object; but you can not tax for the general welfare of the government of the States.

I deny the power of Congress to tax for the general welfare of the government of the States. I deny the power of Congress to tax for the general welfare of the people considered merely as people, except in their relations to the Government of the United States. As citizens of the United States, connected by allegiance with that Government, the Congress of the United States has the right to tax the country for their benefit, provided in doing so it exercises a governmental power, not one assumed, not a new creation, not something that springs like Minerva from the brain of Jupiter in an instant of time and in full splendor. Sir, our fathers did not make this Government to meet the fancies and the isms and the new ideas that might arise from time to time and might be supposed to create necessities for the intervention of law in order to promote the general welfare of the people. Our people then and now were and are able to take care of their private welfare; and the welfare of the people of the United States to-day aggregated in this enormous display of wealth and prosperity is the result of the toiling millions who have been free from the taxing powers of Congress, and Congress has been restrained from invading their rights.

I will not protract this argument. I had supposed that I was done with it, and I would not have risen to-day at all upon this question but for the fact that the honorable Senator from New York did me the honor to refer to me in the debate and to call in question some of the positions which I had taken.

Mr. President, I did demonstrate, I thought, not by argumentation of my own but by facts which I produced, by the recitals from each of the several deeds of cession made by the six great land States, that the right to the soil was transferred to the United States by these different States in lands that belonged to them. Did the honorable Senator understand me to argue that because the Government of the United States received a deed from the State of Georgia to a portion of the country which is included now in the Mississippi Valley, the powers of the General Government of the United States were thereby increased? Surely not. I trust that I have not stultified myself in the estimation of that great lawyer by taking a position of that kind. I have always argued that no State government and no combination of State governments, otherwise than by an amendment of the Constitution, can confer power upon Congress. Here is the limitation of the powers of Congress; there is the charter; the States can not enlarge it or improve it, as I say, except by amending the Constitution.

Now, then, if these States, in order to preserve peace among themselves and to get Maryland and Delaware to consent to come into the Confederation, agreed that they would yield up their lands held outside of their ordinary boundaries far abroad, reaching as far west as the Mississippi River, into the hands of Congress as a common trustee for the benefit of the States, and if each State in its deed of cession said for the benefit of the several States, the State making the grant inclusive, and if Congress accepted the trust in that way, and if the agents of the States came into Congress, so that there might be no mistake about it, and yielded the trust openly into the hands of Congress in session, and then attached to this land the trust and use that it was to be for the benefit of the several States, can anybody discern in that grant any analogy at all in relation to the grant of powers by the people of the United States in their various conventions with which legislation, as I said, had nothing to do, to the Government of the United States putting restraints upon States and upon government also as they went along? No, sir; the analogy is impossible; and the resort of the honorable Senator from New York to that supposed analogy, it occurs to me, only shows that even with his vast ability he had not discovered an argument that he thought was even plausible to maintain the position here to-day. That came from the States not as a power, but it came from the States as a grant of land subject to conditions. I grant you that the conditions have not always been complied with; Congress has abused them.

The honorable Senator from Tennessee the other day called our attention to the fact that after money was collected into the Treasury Congress might go on and appropiate it to improper purposes and no court might have the power to restrain it. That is true. We can abuse our trust every day if we choose to do it, without personal responsibility to the law; but that does not argue that we have the right to do it. The honorable Senator from Tennessee may justify himself according to his opinion in doing what he deems proper; my oath will justify me or require me, according to my opinion, in voting against it; but that does not increase the power or the right, because we have the power merely, to appropriate property. The honorable Senator from New York seems to take the same line of argumentation, as though it derived some strength from the admirable manner in which the Senator from Tennessee had handled this question; but the argument is utterly fallacious. It will not do to say that because we have money in the Treasury, therefore we have unlimited power over that money. That is not safe to the people of the United States.

Mr. EVARTS. The Senator will allow me to say that that was not my proposition. I stated a proposition that I understood to come from the other side—I did not impute it to the Senator from Alabama—that I understood a distinction was taken also that if the money were in the Treasury, then there was a constitutional power to apply it in this way, but that it would not do to rest upon taxation in future as constitutional to furnish means.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he took the same view with the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. EVARTS. Not at all. I did not discuss that subject except in that way.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg pardon of the Senator from New York, and address my argument to the Senator from Tennessee as long as he has taken up that absurd position, as the Senator from New York now argues.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me a word?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACKSON. It was not my proposition. It was the proposition of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I think I am the parent of this bill, and I do not know my own child. [Laughter.]

Mr. JACKSON. Listen to what the Senator says. I read from the RECORD:

> What money there is now in the Treasury, being the property of the United States, you may divert or apply to any purpose not forbidden by the Constitution.

Mr. MORGAN. Read a little further, please.

Mr. JACKSON. That is sufficient.

Mr. MORGAN. Read a little further.

Mr. JACKSON. I continue to read the Senator's words:

> If the purpose to which you apply it is unwise or unauthorized, still you have the power to so apply it in the exercise of a political power which no judge can call in question.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. Then I go still further and say that in this case "might does not make right." Oh, yes; you have the power; certainly you have the power. We have great powers in this Congress. Sometimes I dread to think of the powers we possess; and when I do think over them seriously, I always feel as if I wanted to put constraint upon the hands of myself and my friends in the exercise of them. We have great powers here. For God's sake do not let us abuse them merely for the gratification of ourselves or our friends. We can take the money out of the Treasury, whatever surplus there may be in it, and we can give it to the Kingdom of Congo in Africa if we choose and nobody can hold us to account for it; but when the people come to think of the purposes for which it was taxed out of them, they will either wonder at our stupidity or our infidelity to our oaths, one of the two, and I do not like to be put in either category myself. I should like to go back to the people I have the honor to represent, every time, and say: "I have tried to appropriate all the money that I voted to appropriate to some distinct governmental purpose, not to find a new one not recognized by the Constitution and hatch up something in my imagination or in the supposed benevolence of my great and magnanimous heart to give away to one man what another poor, honest, laboring man toils for and starves his family perhaps to accumulate."

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I have expressly stated the limitations within which I propose to conduct the debate on constitutional propositions, and I discarded all generalization growing out of the declarations of the preamble, except as pointing and describing what the Constitution and the results of it were proposed. I then said that nothing could be imported from those general terms to increase the means of government that were placed at the disposal of the government thus created, and that nothing could be drawn from them to extinguish or disparage the denials of methods which were framed into the Constitution, and then I undertook to display what I regarded as the Senator's argument within the province of legal construction and interpretation and application, and that is that when the United States had any estate in the land, either included in the first great gifts or in subsequent acquisitions, it was within the common benefit to apply the proceeds of that land to the purposes of this bill, if you please, or the uses of education, not that we approve of this bill or of these uses, but that that was not a perversion of a trust, which was imposed upon that estate, because it was in the common benefit.

I then laid down two legal propositions—that a trust power was to be construed upon the same principles as a trust estate, and that as this trust power was described itself in the clause of the Constitution to be wholly for the purpose of paying the debts and providing for the common defense and the general welfare, as those were the strict terms of the trust power, if the Senator thought and argued that an application to education was within a common benefit to come out of the trust estate, then an application to education to come out of the trust power of taxation under the description of general welfare also could have its origin.

But I have not undertaken to give any latitude to my constitutional opinions in regard to what the limitations or the restrictions in the Constitution are. Those who think that this is not within the general welfare must condemn it. If they think it is within the general welfare, it is as much within it under the taxing power as it is under any of the other enabling clauses of the Constitution.

The Senator from Alabama has been polite enough to say that other constitutional arguments and other constitutional debaters had been presented in this Senate before I became a member of it. Perhaps the Senator will allow me to say that I also had studied and debated these constitutional principles in another forum, more accurate perhaps than that which is pursued here.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Constitution was made for the people, and not the people for the Constitution.

Government is a thing of to-day, and not of yesterday. We all listen to the disquisitions of the political archeologists with undissembled rapture. These subtle explorations into the subterranean recesses of the Constitution and the inner consciousness of its founders have an indescribable delight to those who look to "Time's dark backward and abyss" for information as to what should be done in the emergencies that confront us to-day. It is like turning from Pennsylvania avenue into the buried streets of Herculaneum and Pompeii to ascertain what were the opinions of the politicians of Rome as to the continued coinage of the silver dollar and the reform of the civil service.

Mr. President, whatever may be said about the constitutional powers of Congress upon this subject, it is proper to premise that there are but two methods of interpretation of that venerable instrument. One is that of the doctrinaire who regards government as a scientific problem in which all details are to be subordinated to a general principle in the light of strict construction. The other is that of the practical politician, who recognizes that in the changing processes of a nation's life the application of predetermined and preconceived theories and ideas is impracticable, and that he is wisest who adapts himself to measures that are momentarily fitting, leaving all questions of consistency, subject to the consideration of the public good, to take care of themselves. I belong to the latter class; and, sir, the history of constitutional construction shows that the Constitution has been always so interpreted as to render effectual the will of a majority of the people; and whenever it has ceased to measure the purpose and determinations of a majority of the people it has been amended; and in the greatest debate of all, when peaceful contention was ended, it was amended by the sword. But, sir, with regard to the subject which we are now considering, whether from the standpoint of strict construction or of liberal interpretation of the principles of the Constitution, it has never been contended from the foundation of the Government down to this present time that popular education was either directly or indirectly under the control of the General Government or subjected to its supervision.

The practical question that confronts us here is whether or not, admitting that this constitutional power exists, a necessity has been shown that requires it to be evoked and demands that it shall be exercised.

Popular education may have suffered from not being under the control of the General Government; something of precision, of force, and something of energy may have been lost; but on the other hand the advantages gained have been immeasurable. It has been broader and freer; it has been applied more directly to the necessities and wants of the people in their various localities, and it has drawn its power from broader and more enduring sources, so that at last it has come that this system of public-school education has become imbedded in the convictions of the people as a permanent and constantly increasing factor and element in the national life. Its right to exist is nowhere seriously questioned. If it ever had enemies, they have been converted into friends, or they have disappeared. Religious prejudice, that at one time was thought likely to assail it, has become one of its strongest safeguards. The most violent sectionalism and fanaticism has never dared to assail it. And we may confidently assume that if left to the operation of those great agencies that have hitherto controlled it it will broaden and widen in its application and continue in the future, as it has been in the past, the most beneficent and most powerful element in our national growth and development.

Sir, I do not regard this matter precisely as some of those who advocate this bill are inclined to do. The difference between those States that now especially require assistance from the national Treasury and those that have from their own energies conducted this system to such a magnificent conclusion is fundamental. The Southern States saw fit to build their society upon a different theory. They did not believe in the education of the masses of the people; they did not believe in free labor; they constructed the fabric of their civilization, such as it was, upon an entirely different basis. The system of free public-school education as such had its distinctive origin in the North and in New England.

The forty thousand English exiles who came from Great Britain between 1620 and 1650 brought with them to America the elements of a civilization the most rapacious, the most arrogant, and the most relentless ever known in the history of colonization. They brought hither political ideas of inconceivable energy—self-government, liberty of conscience, and universal education. Under them the free-school system was early established and widely disseminated. For a space, battling with savages, poverty, and winter, they lingered upon the coast, amid the gloomy forests and upon the sterile declivities of the stony hills of Massachusetts, wresting a scanty subsistence from the stingy soil and the stormy sea. Extending their wealth and widening their power, they turned their faces westward, and in two centuries the column has marched across the continent, subduing it by peaceful domination. Descending the slopes of the Alleghanies, spreading over the vast alluvial valleys of the Ohio, the Mississippi, and the Missouri, scaling the Rocky Mountains, building States, constructing cities, railroads, tranquil institutions, and organizing civilization, it now pauses on the coast of the Pacific, gazing northward and gazing southward, and meditating new conquests from the equator to the poles.

While that population remained homogeneous, one result of universal education was the selection of the highest representative men in the various communities as political leaders; and thus the civilization of the North impressed itself with prodigious power upon the New World. But it was not until the invasion of foreign elements began that the tremendous assimilating power of the common-school system became apparent. While the population remained homogeneous the problem was simple; but with the influx of the Germans, the Scandinavians, and the Irish it became complicated. Detached communities, surrounded by jealous and to some extent unfriendly populations, were liable to grow up in permanent alienation from our system. Here the common-school system developed unsuspected powers, and by educating together the children of immigrants and natives within the limits of its operation overcame the fatalities of race and the obstacles of instinct and blended them in the succeeding generation into the great mass of American citizenship.

And, sir, to come down one step further, to the common-school system and its operation in the great free communities of the North, more than to all other influences combined, is to be attributed that pervading, steadfast, unrelenting devotion to free government and fidelity to free institutions, to liberty of conscience, and to universal education that made the North invincible in that great struggle that created those impregnable bulwarks of civilization against which the passionate valor of the South dashed itself in vain.

And, sir, it is due to the prevalence of the common-school system, unaided by governmental intervention, gaining its force from those interior influences, by the exercise of which nations as well as men become great and strong, that since the war closed, upon the ruins of that civilization in the South, has been erected, so far as it has proceeded, that tranquil and orderly fabric of industrial activity and reasonable policies, rich in every element of present prosperity, but far richer in every prophecy of future greatness, opulence, and renown. And, sir, it is to the influence of that system, upon the original purposes and designs of its authors, that we are to look, if we are to ever attain to the complete rehabilitation of the Union, with all its members in harmonious accord, the harsh and baleful contentions of the past forming the bond of stronger and more enduring alliance in the future.

Now, sir, these great results having been thus reached, admitting that the Constitution contains this dormant and hitherto unexerted power, conceding that within the general-welfare clause or in any other clause that the widest latitudinarian may claim can throw open its avenues and gates wide enough to admit the power of Congress to do what it pleases, admitting that this is strictly within the province of the Constitution, the practical question is before us, what necessity exists to call it into exercise? Why should it be evoked? Why should we introduce a new element into this great system approved by the stupendous results which have been achieved under it, and attempt the novel, doubtful, questionable, and untried experiment of turning over the common-school system of the nation into the custody of the General Government?

Mr. President, the South is unjust to itself. One of the most painful indications, one of the most distressing symptoms in the South is its want of self-reliance, its disposition in every calamity, in every disaster, whether great or trivial, instead of relying upon itself and learning the lesson that they who would have wings must tempt the abyss, to call upon the National Government or upon the charity of the people for assistance. The South has yet to learn the lesson of self-reliance. This is the secret prescription that makes States and their citizens robust, powerful, and enduring.

There is too much disposition to dwell upon the impoverishment of the South. The South was not impoverished by the war; it was enriched by the war. When the slaves were enfranchised the white men of the South were emancipated; and it is not well to argue here that because the ownership of four millions of men was transferred from their masters to themselves they became less valuable to the State. Sir, a freeman is better than a slave; and no matter how degraded, no matter how ignorant, no matter how helpless were the emancipated freedmen, they were better free than when they were slaves. They have not been deported; they are there; their labor is there; their muscle is there; their experience is there; their earnings are there; and it is a strange basis upon which to establish this claim for relief that four millions of slaves were translated into free American citizens.

I came across a day or two since, in the columns of a Democratic newspaper entirely friendly to the South, an editorial, from which I will read a brief extract as bearing upon this subject. Speaking of the period that has transpired since the war, this article proceeds:

The outcome has been the recuperation of the South. Interrupted channels of traffic have been repaired and re-established. Where, on account of changed conditions, former prosperity in the old direction has not been regained, a tenfold measure of prosperity in another has been achieved. Poverty led to individual enterprise and the stress of necessity has created an industrial feeling unknown in former times. The inexhaustible resources of a rich domain, formerly for the most part unheeded, were eagerly scanned and estimated in the hope of obtaining help. Capital was invited, wealth was developed, and manufactures arose. So that, at a little more than twenty years after the war, we find a people without complaint as to their condition, animated by common sentiments as to frugality and industry, and hopeful as to their future prospects.

In some things the new South is greatly the gainer compared with the South that was. Instead of depending, as formerly, on the production of one or two staples, diversified production has become the rule. It is a remarkable fact that even in the special cases which were supposed to depend wholly on slave labor the result of the changed conditions is a greatly increased production. A few figures will indicate more clearly the progress to which we have referred.

The assessed value of property—

That is, in the South—has increased $900,000,000 since 1870.

Seven years.

In the same period 11,000 miles of new railway have been built, involving an expenditure of nearly $500,000,000. Cotton-mills have doubled in number and capacity during the last five years, and are still rapidly increasing. In the same time the cottonseed-oil mills have quadrupled in number, and employ now a capital of $11,000,000. The increased production of iron and coal has more than doubled. In a word, the march of enterprise is in every direction and material progress in the South is advancing with rapid strides. In this prosperity all classes of the people share, and even the old slave population is manifesting a vast gain in industry and thrift.

Do the men of the South deny that this statement is true? Will any Senator from any Southern State rise in his place and declare that it is false? Is there any Senator who will admit that the condition of the South is not immeasurably better than it was before the war, or who will claim that in the increase of material advantages, in wealth, and in assurances for the future that statement is exaggerated? If not——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If it came down to mere matter of public revenues I say that we are not in as good a condition as we were in before the war, and yet I do not wish to affect the results of the war.

Mr. INGALLS. If that is not the case, if the South is not worse than it was before the war, if its material progress is constantly upward and onward, upon what ground, consistent with self-respect, consistent with duty to the other States in the Union, can be based this continuous clamor and uproar and importunity for assistance from the national Treasury upon the theory of the impoverishment of the South? Is it in consequence of the action of the Government in freeing and enfranchising the slaves? Sir, that problem has given grave thought to wiser men. My view of this subject is necessarily casual and superficial; but I see no occasion for discouragement or despondency about the condition of the negro race in the Southern States. On the contrary it is my deliberate judgment, in the light of such history as I have been able to peruse, that there is nothing in the history of civilization which compares with the advance made by the African race in the last two centuries on this continent.

It is not just that they should be measured by competition with their Anglo-Saxon oppressors. They should be contrasted with their ancestors and their contemporaries in the Dark Continent; in the tropical wildernesses where the negro race still swarms in amazing fecundity and unexampled degradation—the lowest in the scale of humanity. The character of the aboriginal negro is compounded of instincts at once puerile and ferocious; of grotesque vanity and squalid superstition; of virtues and vices that appear equally destitute of moral qualities, forming a type so degraded that the conscience of civilized nations has hitherto scarcely revolted against treating them with continued denial of justice and making them the unwilling victims of indolence and cupidity. Their political society in Africa is only an incoherent aggregation of hostile tribes; their religion an infamous and bloody idolatry. They have neither history nor literature nor laws, and are scarcely distinguishable in their habits and traits from the beasts that perish.

But in contrast with this revolting picture look upon the four millions of Africans upon this continent. They have become Christians. Their souls—and the soul of man is hospitable to great thoughts—their souls have risen to the sublimest conceptions which humanity is capable of entertaining—one invisible, supreme, and eternal God, the immortality of the soul and its conscious existence beyond the grave. In their political condition they have advanced, feebly and with halting steps, it may be, but they have advanced to the high plane of American citizenship with reasonable and adequate ideas and conceptions of what that implies. For centuries they endured unexampled oppression with uncomplaining patience; and if during the war that was waged to rivet more firmly the chains that bound them there were instances where the negroes in the South committed outrages upon the women and children who were left to their charge, or destroyed or plundered the property that was confided to their care, while their masters were absent waging battle to reduce them to a profounder and more hopeless subjection and servitude, history does not record that fact. And since the war closed, having been elevated to citizenship, they have conducted themselves with an orderly and tranquil dignity that has justified the anticipation of those who declared that God had made of one blood all the nations of the earth, and has been the amazement and the admiration of the civilized world. They have acquired property; they have builded homes; they have established permanent domestic relations; they have deposited their savings in the banks; they have gathered about the schoolmaster; they have studied the Bible, and they can be safely left alone to work out their destiny under the influences that have operated to make all other members of our political society patriotic, intelligent, and happy. There is ample ground to warrant the expectation that the African race upon the American continent is destined hereafter to act no unimportant part in the great drama of our civilization.

Therefore, Mr. President, admitting that the constitutional power exists, which I do not dispute, admitting that we have the right to appropriate this money from the Treasury, which I do not deny, I contend that there is nothing in the condition of the South, their resources, the relations of the enfranchised slaves, that renders it necessary to call this great power into activity, to subvert the principle and practice of the public-school system, and to impose this enormous burden under false pretenses upon the finances of the nation.

It has sometimes been intimated that, having produced this condition of affairs in the South, the people of the North were unwilling to contribute to its alleviation. Sir, that stigma does not rest upon me. No one will make greater concessions, go farther and stay longer, than I will in the exercise of any constitutional power to relieve distress or promote the public welfare in any portion of our common country. I have not heard the representative of any Southern State make any other claim than this, not that they could not educate the Anglo-Saxon, not that they could not take care of their white illiterates, but that in consequence of the results of the war they had been subjected to great additional burdens which the North ought in justice and equity to share.

If that be the object and purpose of this bill, then let it be so amended and framed. If there be any State that, in consequence of impoverished resources, of decrease of tax-paying capacity, of excessive illiteracy between the ages of six and twenty-one years, is unable to provide schools, to hire teachers, to erect school-houses and furnish apparatus, let this be declared, and no Senator will vote with wider liberality than I to alleviate the distress.

If this measure can be so modified, as I understand the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] proposes, to provide for liberal appropriations from the Treasury to support colored schools for children within the prescribed school ages of the States where they are established, it will be a pleasure and a duty to contribute to that result. But unless some such method as that can be adopted, unless the false pretenses upon which it is supported are abandoned, unless those who are now endeavoring to promote it relinquish the idea that pecuniary assistance is demanded or will be accepted by any portion of this country north of the Potomac and the Ohio Rivers, where the free-school system has been for so many generations successfully maintained by self-imposed taxation, I shall continue to oppose it. But let me not be misunderstood. It is not from hostility nor indifference; but because of my conviction that there is one duty alone that rests upon us—the obligation to give assistance for the purposes for which aid is necessary, and not upon the injurious pretension that the great States of the North and West, unable or unwilling longer to maintain their public-school system, are asking alms from the national Treasury.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have taken no share in the general debate upon this bill, either at the present session or when it passed during the last Congress. My silence is not due to any indifference to the great object which is intended to be accomplished, or to any want of approbation of the particular method or scheme which is devised here. I think there is no single object in public life dearer to me, no stronger object of personal desire, than the establishment of a perfect system of common-school education over the entire country. But I rise now only to correct a misapprehension of the Senator from Kansas who has just addressed the Senate.

I have been familiar from the beginning with this effort for a national system of education; I drew the first bill ever proposed, and the first bill which ever passed either branch of Congress, some ten or fifteen years ago. It was the same bill which, with some changes, I afterward introduced in the Senate, and which passed here. That proposition never came from the wish, the demand, or the request of the people of the South. When it first passed the House of Representatives, in the year 1872 or 1873, but three Southern Democratic votes, I think, were recorded in its favor. The proposition came from a Northern Representative, was devised by a Northern Representative, was supported almost exclusively by Northern Representatives, and was supported all over the North by the press, by religious bodies, by educational bodies that voiced the sentiment and the wish of the people of the North. Its acceptance at the South, with that portion of the South now dominant, has been the result of a gradual growth of public sentiment.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator a question. My attention was diverted a moment ago when the Senator made a statement in reference to the vote on the first bill of this character in the other House.

Mr. HOAR. Upon the first bill, according to my recollection, there were but three Southern Democratic votes cast in favor of it—Mr. Golladay, of Tennessee, and two gentlemen from the State of Kentucky; one of them, I believe, was Mr. Standiford.

Mr. GEORGE. In what year was that?

Mr. HOAR. In 1872 or 1873, I think. It seems to me that the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], to whose eloquent appeal I listened with admiration, with a large portion of which I most heartily and entirely concur, errs in another opinion, which pervades his entire speech. It is that Northern States are taxing themselves to yield to a demand, or that Southern States are making a demand. This bill proceeds upon the ground that in a nation in the government of which every citizen has an equal share, where the vote of the negro on the plantation in Arkansas or Mississippi equals the vote of the merchant prince in Boston or New York in regard to the measures and policies upon which the value of the property and the security of the business of the latter is dependent, the education of that citizen, taking that equal part in the government of the Republic, is as much the concern of the merchant prince as it is of the near neighbor of the negro on the plantation. There is not an interest in which the people of Massachusetts or the people of Kansas are concerned which is to be affected by the voice of the American people in regard to which it is possible to draw a distinction between the influence and the power of the illiterate person in Louisiana and the illiterate person in Massachusetts. It is because we are one, it is because their society is our society, it is because their interest is our interest, it is because in the sublime triumph which ended in 1865 it was determined that hereafter and forever this was to be a nation and not an aggregation of warring and conflicting communities held together by a feeble band, that we have a right to demand that the national resources shall be poured out to their fullest extent to secure for every American citizen that intelligence which is necessary to the common benefit and interest of all.

The honorable Senator from Kansas said yesterday or the day before, and repeated it several times, that this bill was an undertaking to appeal to the liberality or the generosity or the justice of the American Congress on false pretenses, and that a State that would accept it would be actuated by the same spirit which would pick a pocket or rob a church.

Mr. INGALLS. Or rob a graveyard.

Mr. HOAR. Or rob a graveyard; and the Senator supported that proposition by reference to a scheme upon which by this bill the money which is to be raised is to be distributed.

Mr. INGALLS. Section 2 I referred to.

Mr. HOAR. If I can find the language of the Senator I should like to read it. He said:

> Sir, this bill is essentially dishonest, and under section 2 upon the basis of distribution that is proposed the States which will take money under this bill are actuated by precisely the same spirit that would induce a man to pick a pocket or to rob a graveyard. When the States to whom this donation is to be given propose to ask us to vote $77,000,000 to be distributed upon the basis of illiteracy, to be determined by ascertaining the number of people within their limits above the age of ten years who can neither read nor write, that is essentially dishonest. It is an act of grand larceny of the Treasury of the United States. They do not intend to take that money for the purpose of educating those people upon whose illiteracy they obtain it. Let there be no misunderstanding about this matter. When the States of the South, for whom this money is intended, come here and ask that they shall obtain it, and that the basis of distribution shall be the number of illiterates above the age of ten years without any maximum, they know perfectly well, and the country knows, that they are obtaining that money under false pretenses.
> That amendment—
> Speaking of his own amendment—
> was rejected by a vote, I believe, of 17 to 28; and that was a declaration of the purpose and the intention of those who are promoting this bill, and that is to obtain for the States of the South a vastly greater proportion of this money than they are by any reason or any equity entitled to.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator ought not to do me an injustice by withholding the statement of the ground on which I made that declaration.

Mr. HOAR. I thought I had stated it.

Mr. INGALLS. Of course I adhere to my language, but the Senator, by reading extracts detached from the remainder, does me an injustice.

Mr. HOAR. Then let me read further.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not ask the Senator to read all of it, but the few lines which he read fail to state the reason I gave for my statement.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I was coming to. I understand the reason for the Senator's statement. He states that the South are engaged in a fraudulent combination to get much more than their proportionate share of this fund. The Senator bases it upon a provision of the bill that the distribution is to be made on the basis of the illiteracy over ten years of age, of persons from ten years to ninety, and he says that the just proposition, which would reduce them more nearly to their proper share, would be to base it upon the illiteracy of those persons between ten years and twenty-one.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes; of school age.

Mr. HOAR. Persons of school age.

Mr. INGALLS. Persons who would receive the benefit of the money.

Mr. HOAR. Persons who would receive the benefit of the money. Now, let us see. I have taken the two States of Massachusetts and Mississippi from the census, which, I suppose, furnish a perfectly fair test and sample of the whole thing. In Massachusetts the whole number of illiterates over ten years of age is 92,980. I ought to say that we stand at the head of all communities on the face of the earth in regard to the natives, but these illiterates are made up chiefly of foreign residents in Massachusetts who have moved there. The number of illiterates in Massachusetts over ten years of age, let me repeat, is 92,980. The number of illiterates in Mississippi over ten years of age is 373,201. So on the basis of the bill Mississippi gets four times as much as Massachusetts, with which Massachusetts is entirely content.

Now the number of illiterates in Massachusetts over twenty-one is 83,891. Subtracting that from the whole number, the number of illiterates in Massachusetts between ten and twenty-one, which the Senator from Kansas would take as a basis, is 9,089; whereas the number of illiterates over twenty-one in Mississippi is 235,911, which deducted from 373,201 leaves 138,290; so that under the basis proposed by the Senator from Kansas the State of Mississippi, which is trying to cheat the United States by false pretenses, would get fifteen times as much as Massachusetts, whereas under the basis proposed by the bill she gets four times as much.

Mr. HOAR. I think sometimes people lie under mistakes from not having read their figures before they make their speech.

Mr. President, I sympathize with the feeling of the Senator from Kansas in regard to the present and the future condition of the black race, but I look at this thing as a practical question. I do not care whether Mississippi or South Carolina or any other State is to blame for not educating or providing for her blacks. I believe that unless the United States Government helps do this thing it will not be done, or if it be done at all it will be done in the far distant future. I believe if the United States Government helps do this thing it will be done; and believing that its accomplishment is a local, individual, State concern to the people of Massachusetts, as much as it is to the people of any other State, that the people of every American State who are to share in American citizenship and American Government should be able to take an intelligent share in that citizenship, I am willing, and the people whom I represent and whose opinions and views I know, are willing, that the United States Government shall make this gift from the public Treasury; and I should be quite inclined to consent, if it were necessary, even to the larger proportion which unwittingly the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kansas proposed should be given to the people of the South and the smaller proportion to the people of the State I represent.

The people of the South, the white Democrats of the South, have sins enough to answer for, before the war, and during the war, and since the war. I join my honorable friend from Kansas in hating as the worst of crimes the suppression of the vote which honestly belongs to a portion of the people in some parts of the country. But I think that people, whatever may have been their faults, are not to be justly taunted either with seeking by dishonest and false pretense to obtain money by this bill from the national Treasury, or with having uttered in the ear of the nation a pusillanimous cry for help. This measure is of Northern origin, it is of Northern construction, it is of Northern support, it is of Northern desire, and it rests upon that constitutional doctrine which has been dear to the heart of the people of the North since the Constitution went into effect, that in all matters which affect nationality or citizenship the people of the United States are one, that "The eye can not say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you."

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, obtained the floor.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to report at this time from the Committee on the Judiciary three bills for the removal of political disabilities, which have been considerably delayed on account of the delay in getting information from the Departments, and in respect of one of whom the gentleman concerned is a very aged man, and he wishes when his time comes to leave this world in perfect peace with the United States. I therefore ask unanimous consent to submit these reports at this time, and I ask for their present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks leave to submit several reports from the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair hears no objection, and the title of the first bill reported will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 3846) to remove the disabilities of Alexander P. Stewart, of La Fayette County, Mississippi.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLAIR. Are they likely to take any time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not any time at all.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state that it appears in this case, as in the two others which I shall submit, that there are regular and respectful petitions and that these gentlemen are not indebted to the United States; so they come within the rule.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed (two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative).

Mr. EDMUNDS. I report House bill No. 3827 of the same character.

The bill (H. R. 3827) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Rosser was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed (two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative).

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present one other report of a similar character, House bill No. 4409.

The bill (H. R. 4409) to remove the disabilities of Edward G. W. Butler, of Missouri, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed (two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative).

Mr. BECK. Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] is entitled to the floor. Does the Senator from Kentucky rise to the bill which has just been passed?

Mr. BECK. I only rose to ask if that is the last bill of that character now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These are the only three that have been presented.

Mr. BECK. I voted for them all, as I always do, and I only rose to say that I do not know any smaller business for the Senate of the United States to be engaged in now than in peddling out bills for the removal of disabilities. I have endeavored for years to have a general bill passed so that this thing should not be done. While I vote for each one I do not know that I can express my idea on the subject of the smallness of the business of peddling them out now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has passed. The Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator from Kentucky does the Committee on the Judiciary and the Senate great injustice. He is entitled to his opinion, and the rest of us are entitled to ours. All that the United States asks of any person now, a respectable and a good citizen, to relieve him from the penalty that the Constitution has imposed upon him for violating his oath, and deserting the Constitution that he had sworn to support, and making war against the United States is, that he shall present a respectful petition showing that he is ready to give up fighting the United States any longer and has paid the debts that he owes to the United States for moneys that he received in his official character. If the Senator thinks that is peddling out the removal of disabilities, he is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland has the floor. Does he yield further?

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. One moment, if I may be allowed. Twelve years ago the House of Representatives, then having a three-fourths Republican majority, passed a bill under the lead of a former Representative from Tennessee, Mr. Maynard, removing all disabilities. Before that time the Senate had done it, but it never was done at the same time in both Houses. It may be a gratification to the Senator from Vermont, after both the Senate and the House have come to an agreement to remove all disabilities, now to be peddling out separate relief bills. If so, in the present condition of the Senate I can not prevent him from being so gratified.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. Mr. President, I do not propose to make a speech on this bill; but since it offers a goodly sum of money to my State for school purposes, I wish very briefly to make known the reasons why I can not vote to receive it.

I believe it is usual, when one is invited to a feast, to give his excuses why he can not partake of the proffered hospitality. Every one who has spoken in favor of this measure—at least on this side of the House—has distinctly stated that all the power claimed for Congress is to appropriate money for the benefit of schools within the States, all the time most emphatically disclaiming all right to control by legislation their school systems, which are conceded to be exclusively within the sphere of State action. I shall view the question entirely in the light of such concessions, without committing myself to the power of appropriation thus claimed. Conceding, then, for the sake of the argument, the power thus claimed, the measure before us forcibly demonstrates the dangers and abuses likely to result from an attempt by Congress to appropriate money to be expended within the States for purposes outside of Federal control, and lying exclusively within the reserved rights and duties of the States.

Right here, in the first attempt to appropriate out of the national Treasury money raised by taxation for the maintenance of public schools, with a full disclaimer on the part of the friends of the bill of any desire or power to shape or control State school systems, we find the baldest attempts to dictate to the States how those systems shall be ordered and regulated. It first provides that so many millions of dollars shall be distributed among the States for the support of common schools upon the basis of illiteracy. If it stopped there it would be such a law as its advocates alone claim the power to enact. But the bill further proceeds to prescribe a course of studies as a condition precedent to the enjoyment of its bounty. It is perfectly manifest that if we have the right to prescribe one course of study of the simplest kind we have the right in like manner to enforce another of a still higher grade; or, in other words, we can take charge of that entire branch of school legislation, giving the State the alternative of conforming to our will or of losing all claim to her share of such apportionment.

Another section provides that unless a State raises by home taxation as much money as her apportionment under the law would give her she shall forfeit the difference between the amount she does raise and the amount of her apportionment. Thus, she must adapt her legislation to this bill in the exercise of her sovereign right of taxation or pay the penalty of disobedience.

Another section forbids the spending of any of the money allotted to a State toward building school-houses. It makes the erection of more school-houses absolutely necessary to the full fruition of this money in many of the States, but imposes upon such States the necessity of further State taxation for such new school-houses or makes them forfeit all right to any share of this common fund.

Another section provides that no money shall be paid out to any State which shall not have provided a system of free common schools for all its children of school age, without distinction of race or color, either in the raising or in the distributing of school revenues, or in the school facilities afforded. Several States, as their laws now stand, must report systems in a greater or less degree not conformable to this requirement. Such States, then, must forfeit all claim to any share of this fund, whilst bearing their full share of the burdens of taxation, or hasten to conform their laws to the dictation of Congress.

Now, let us not be told that Congress does not actually establish any school system in a State by direct and positive legislation, but only enacts conditions precedent which we must conform to if we desire to reap any benefit from this legislation. Such a law, it is plain, will prove a direct and powerful agency toward coercing States in such law-making as Congress chooses to impose upon them. It will be an entering wedge to the control of State systems of education, to be driven home by the powerful influences of great and much-coveted largesses on the one hand and of heavy punishments by way of forfeitures on the other. If it were in the power of a State to escape taxation while rejecting all benefit from such a law there would be but little practical hardship. But she must pay her quota of taxation, while if she does not bow the knee to Federal dictation like a whipped child she is driven away from the table and is not permitted to partake of the feast.

If the representatives of the States and people once succumb to this species of legislation, then indeed will our States and people lie prostrate at the feet of Federal power. This Government can tax the people ad libitum—$70,000,000 per annum, if they choose, instead of an average of $7,000,000 for school purposes; and then debar any State from the enjoyment of any share of this enormous burden until she complies with any conditions Congress sees fit to impose. If we can donate public money for schools, prescribing rules to which States must accede by corresponding legislation, what is to hinder Congress from appropriating money to improve the road systems of the States, with like provisions for forfeitures upon the non-compliance with prescribed conditions? And so with the police systems and other great branches of the State's legislative powers.

Sir, such legislation as the bill before us initiates is nothing but the beginning of a system which would enable the General Government, by tempting gifts on the one hand and crushing forfeitures on the other, to bring the States into the most disgraceful of all subjections, based in equal degrees upon the ignoble motives of greed and fear.

The simple truth must be, Mr. President, and common sense so declares, that when subjects like education, internal police, and road systems are clearly committed to the States their jurisdiction over such matters is conclusive, and Congress has nothing whatever to do with them. Being reserved to the States, it is their business not only to legislate on such subjects but to support them by all needful taxation. If Congress has the power to aid in their support, we have just as much power to support them altogether; and all experience teaches that the power which supports will control.

I have not the slightest idea that the support supplied by this bill will end with the eight years. The State systems—especially in the South—will be enlarged and made more costly by your gifts; so that at the end of that term of years their proportions will have outgrown the ability of the States to manage, and especially will have outrun their disposition to maintain, after they have leaned so long upon a more powerful arm. The eight years will not have materially reduced the mass of illiteracy; and rather than surrender the benefits gained, by recommitting the school systems entirely to feeble and inadequate hands, the same order of things will be continued, with extended control on the part of Congress and increased subserviency on the part of the States, all of which will end in a grand national scheme of education, with a great central bureau at Washington supervising and directing every detail of common-school education throughout the country.

Sir, there is no safety to our institutions but in confining both the General Government and the States within their legitimate powers and duties, both as to appropriations and legislation. Let the States be never so jealous and guarded, power will always be tending from the many to the few. But if the States come and beseech the General Government to assume their proper functions and to bear their burdens, and to overshadow them with its powers in matters with which it was never intended to interfere, and which it can not in any wise deal without the State's consent, then, indeed, will the march of empire toward this capital be fearfully accelerated.

Let Congress, under the assumed or real power of appropriating the public money toward other purposes than those growing out of their enumerated powers, strive to stamp out cattle plagues or alleviate the destitution of storm or plague stricken people either at home or abroad, or erect a grand national university in this beautiful city; for such matters are either occasional and evanescent in their character, or may be referred to other grants of power to Congress, and are not important to be controlled by the States, in order to preserve their dignity and their rightful status in our dual system of government; but let us keep our hands away from our State school systems, for which we have not and never claimed the power to legislate, and even now disclaim such power, while all the while we are insidiously imposing the heavy hand of power on them and are treacherously bringing gifts, in return for which we demand that they shall conform their legislation to our will or lose all benefit of the taxation, the burden of which they have helped to bear.

While I would not and do not battle for the rights of the States to render them powerful and aggressive as against the General Government, I do most anxiously and most earnestly beseech that all their plain and undisputed rights and jurisdiction shall be most sacredly guarded, as the only security we have on earth to be at once free and the citizens of an almost illimitable empire.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, in view of the full and exhaustive discussion of this bill, I have no wish to delay the action of the Senate by prolonging the debate, and will therefore content myself by putting upon record, without argument or elaboration, some of the reasons which will control my vote.

Believing as I do, and as I think has been clearly shown by the arguments and authorities cited by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the two Senators from Texas, that Congress has no power under the Constitution to levy and collect taxes and appropriate the money so collected to this purely State purpose of maintaining a system of common schools, I shall record my vote against the passage of the bill.

But if it was free from all constitutional objection I should still oppose it, for the reason that the money to be appropriated for this purpose, whether taken from the treasury of the several States or from the Federal Treasury, is drawn by taxation from the pockets of the people of the several States and Territories. And as the people have to pay these $77,000,000, it becomes a matter of interest to them to ascertain the method by which it can be paid with the least inconvenience and injury to themselves.

If collected under the direct-tax system of the States every dollar drawn from their earnings would go into the Treasury less the small commission for collection. And they would get the benefit of all that they were compelled to pay—each citizen having contributed in proportion to his wealth and his ability to pay. Not so, however, under the Federal system of taxation; about two-thirds of our Federal revenues being collected under our tariff laws, in the practical operations of which, to get $1 into the Treasury they are compelled to pay many dollars in the way of bounty to the protected home manufacturers, and the poorest man often compelled to pay as much as the most wealthy.

Therefore, on the score of economy as well as of right, I would leave the matter of common-school education to the States, where it properly, legitimately, and exclusively belongs.

I will not consent that the people of Tennessee shall be taxed to educate the children of Massachusetts or Louisiana. Nor would I consent to tax the people of Massachusetts or Louisiana to educate the children of Tennessee. Nor do I wish to consult either the representatives or people of other States as to how much the people of Tennessee shall be taxed to support their own domestic institutions, educational or others. Nor do I wish to be consulted or in any manner interfere with the administration of the domestic affairs of any State other than my own. Nor would I ever consent to see the strong hand of Federal power extended into any State for the purpose of controlling or in any manner interfering with its domestic affairs.

Each State is the best judge of its own educational necessities, and the extent to which it is able to meet them, and should be left free to determine for itself, and to provide for these necessities in its own way. And even though it may not be able to provide for them as fully as it may desire, is it for that reason, to assume the rôle of mendicant and ask alms at the hands of its more fortunate neighbors? If so, let it beg in the ordinary way, and not through the coercive power of the revenue laws of the United States.

Those of us who oppose this bill can well afford to rest the case upon the arguments and authorities already referred to. That it will pass the Senate, however, is a foregone conclusion. I see in it seventy-seven millions of reasons why it will pass.

Mr. MAXEY. I give notice now that when the bill is reported to the Senate I shall offer in the Senate the same amendment which I offered in Committee of the Whole, proposing to add after the word "Treasury" in the fourth line of the first section the words "not otherwise appropriated," &c.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Was not that amendment passed upon?

Mr. MAXEY. It will not take me three minutes to state what I wish to say.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Was not that amendment passed upon; and, if so, can it be offered again just as it was before?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the amendment has been passed upon in committee, and that it can be renewed in the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. I have a right to renew it in the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not want to hear what occurred in committee, because I prefer to have it stated here. Was not the amendment of the Senator from Texas offered before and passed upon in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. MAXEY. I will now give my reasons for renewing the amendment in the Senate. When the amendment was offered in Committee of the Whole I stated that I was not prepared to say whether the usual words, "not otherwise appropriated," had been left out by accident or design. I afterward heard the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire, which I will read, and I now think it was not done by accident. Last Wednesday evening he said, as printed in the RECORD of February 18, page 1513:

> This bill is the result of three months' debate and careful examination, and the closest possible scrutiny by the Republican caucus in the last Congress. They considered every line and syllable, every abbreviation and every punctuation point, and it was thought that the bill was as sufficiently restricted and close in its provisions with reference to the expenditure of this money as the wit of man could make it.

Now, I am satisfied that those words were left out with a design, and for this purpose: The argument has been made on this floor that no dollar can be placed in the Treasury by taxation except to carry out one of the enumerated powers in the Constitution, but that after the money gets into the Treasury, then, under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, it can be paid out without the slightest regard to the enumerated powers.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Is this an amendment that has been acted upon?

Mr. MAXEY. I do not desire to be interrupted.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If it is an amendment that has been acted upon in Committee of the Whole I have a right, or any other Senator has a right, to ask that it shall be printed anew and laid upon the desks of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask now that it shall be printed anew before it is acted upon.

Mr. MAXEY. I should be glad to go on with what I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. MAXEY. As the bill now stands it reads, "There shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums." That language would possibly give ground for the most fallacious argument that was ever offered on the floor of any legislative body; but to put the words in which I offered to put in, "not otherwise appropriated," and especially excepting out the class of debt to which I referred, the current expenses of the Government, the interest on the public debt, the sinking fund, and the large amount which we have agreed to vote for pensions, then this would not go out of the Treasury, but would have to be collected by taxation, and away would go that argument.

The Senator from Iowa, in the short discussion he had upon that point, admitted the proposition that if we passed this bill the money would have to be raised by taxation if necessary, or even by a loan if necessary, in order to comply with it, and thus that argument passed by the board.

Therefore I say that when we go before the country on this bill the bill should state the truth. It should say that what we design and intend if the bill passes is that the people of this country are to be taxed to carry it out, and if that be true, then those who have made this argument concede themselves that the money has to be raised by taxation; that there being no grant of power in the Constitution to authorize that taxation, we have no right to make it. It is for that reason that I make the proposition to amend the first section of the bill as I have indicated.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate adjourn to Monday next.

Several SENATORS. Say Tuesday.

Mr. PLUMB. I will say Tuesday.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me to have an amendment reprinted?

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Texas shall be reprinted, if it is to be reoffered, so that we may know exactly what we are doing with amendments to this bill. I believe that that is a request which is usually granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has not yet offered his amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understood him to offer it before he commenced his remarks.

Mr. MAXEY. I gave notice that when the bill passed into the Senate I should offer it. That is according to the rules of the Senate, and it is what I propose to do.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I want to have it printed. I know what the amendment is, but it is better to have it on the desks of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas insist on his motion?

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator to withhold his motion for a moment.

Mr. PLUMB. I will withhold the motion for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to offer an amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. I offer some amendments intended to be proposed to the bill so that they may be printed before the next meeting of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the proposed amendments will be received and printed.

Mr. PLUMB. I now renew my motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I appeal to the Senator from Kansas to allow me to make an inquiry of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. PLUMB. I withhold the motion for that purpose.

Mr. BLAIR. I was unable to hear the Senator from Texas. I ask the attention of the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire appeals to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I was able to hear very little of what the Senator from Texas either said or read. I gathered that he inferred that there was some indirection or some sleight-of-hand work with reference to the first section of the bill. I was not aware of any; and I am sure I can not make any statement without knowing precisely what he said. There is no objection to the Senator offering any amendment, whether it has been passed upon already or not. I have no desire whatever to prevent any amendment being offered.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator belongs to the sanhedrim, and I do not belong to that body.

ADJOURNMENT TO TUESDAY.

Mr. PLUMB. I will change my motion, at the request of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], and move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next. The Senate appreciate the reason for that. If we meet on Monday we shall immediately adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House bills of the Senate of the following titles; which were read twice, referred to the committees named, and ordered to be printed:

JAMES CLIFFORD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 738) for the relief of James Clifford; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent to put that bill upon its passage at this time. I will state that the same bill, verbatim et literatim, has been reported from the Committee on Claims and is now pending on the Calendar. It is a very meritorious measure, and I think will be passed without objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $576.70 shall be paid to James Clifford, of Fort Smith, Ark., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in payment for iron doors and windows furnished for the United States jail at Fort Smith, in the western district of Arkansas, during the year 1874, under employment by the jailer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to inquire if this bill has been considered by a committee of the House?

Mr. ROGERS. It has; and it has been reported both this session and last session. I think this is the fourth time this bill has been reported by a committee of this House, and it is now on the Calendar.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will give a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to hear an explanation, reserving the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] reserves the right to object.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I do not think that is regular. I have no objection to the bill being considered, but I do not wish to have its consideration rest on the ability of the gentleman in charge of it to convince one man in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The bill is before the House for consideration.

Mr. ROGERS. In 1874 there were imprisoned in the jail at my town, the Federal jail, under the exclusive control of the Federal Government, and belonging to the Government, about one hundred prisoners, and they were still coming in, the court at Fort Smith being the court which exercises jurisdiction over the Indian Territory. The marshal of the district was at that time absent with a batch of prisoners to be confined at Detroit, Mich. In his absence it became necessary, by reason of want of space in the single room in which these prisoners were confined, to make some changes in another room adjoining and to strengthen both rooms, that the prisoners might be safely kept. The jailer in charge employed this man, whose personal integrity and character I have pleasure in vouching for, in doing this work, including the making and hanging of some iron doors and windows for the jail. This old man, in the utmost innocence and good faith, went forward and did this work. It turned out the jailer had no authority to make the contract, and when the account for the work was referred to the Department of Justice it declined to order the claim to be paid, as there was no authority for doing the work. It accepted the work, and to my personal knowledge, up to the hour I left home, the Government was enjoying the benefit of that work. The old man was driven to bring his case to Congress, and has been here since 1874 asking for the payment of this claim.

It has been reported upon favorably by every committee of both Houses of Congress, I believe, from that time till the present, yet it has never been reached upon the Calendar. The correctness of the claim is sworn to by the marshal and by the jailer who employed Mr. Clifford to do this work; it is certified to by the Federal judge now presiding over that court—a gentleman who was once a member of this body, and who says the work was absolutely necessary in order to safely keep these prisoners, and resulted economically to the Government by dispensing with guards that had been previously necessary for the safe-keeping of the prisoners. The Government has enjoyed the benefits of the work from that day to this. In my judgment, no more honest and straightforward claim was ever presented to Congress than this little claim due to an old man now past seventy years of age, and who has been knocking at the doors of Congress since 1874 to get payment for his labor and material.

A MEMBER. What is the amount?

Mr. ROGERS. A little over $500.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Committee of the Whole House will be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 75, providing for the payment of this claim, and the bill will be laid on the table.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. KELLEY. With entire respect to the House and all its members, I renew my request to incorporate in my remarks on the bill disposed of yesterday for the relief of Fitz-John Porter the review of the testimony, which I propose to substitute for a review of my own. I ask leave to print it in connection with my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] asks unanimous consent to incorporate in his remarks on the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter a review of the testimony by Judge-Advocate-General Holt. Is there objection?

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, the war being over, the tide of battle having moved away, I am in favor of general amnesty; and therefore I am entirely willing that the gentleman should print all he desires.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the leave requested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be granted.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask permission to print in the RECORD a review of Judge Holt's paper.

The SPEAKER. By whom?

Mr. WHEELER. I have prepared it myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a review of the paper which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has obtained leave to print.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MAYBURY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for ten days.

JOSEPH FRANCIS.

Mr. HEWITT. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration a joint resolution (H. Res. 125) which has been reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce. I ask that it may be read subject to objection.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 125) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in view of the life-long services to humanity and to his country of the now venerable Joseph Francis, in the construction and perfection of life-saving appliances by which many thousands of lives have been saved, the thanks of Congress be, and are hereby, tendered to Joseph Francis; and that the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause to be prepared a gold medal, with a suitable inscription, to be presented to Mr. Francis, in recognition of his eminent services.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to discharging the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of this resolution, and proceeding to its consideration?

Mr. COX. I would like to know what will be the effect of the passage of this resolution—whether it confers any privileges or emoluments.

Mr. HEWITT. No privileges follow a vote of thanks by Congress, except to an officer of the Army or Navy. Therefore Mr. Francis will take nothing by the passage of this resolution beyond securing a recognition of services which, according to the unanimous report of the Committee on Commerce, should be recognized in this way.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Can we have the report read?

Mr. HEWITT. It may be read if the gentleman so desires.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] whether this resolution proposes to give to Mr. Francis the credit of having invented the surf-boat?

Mr. HEWITT. It does not. The resolution does not pass on that question.

Mr. SCOTT. That is a question upon which there is some dispute, and one in which a gentleman of my district has an interest. Therefore I could not allow this resolution to go through without objection if it embraced anything of that kind.

Mr. HEWITT. It does not.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and the House proceeded to consider the same.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I supposed that the gentleman from New York was about to have the report read in his time.

Mr. HEWITT. There is a report which can be read. I supposed the House was quite content to vote, and therefore I did not ask to have it read.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I asked to have the report read, and the gentleman assented. I supposed it would be read in his time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. IRION) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the memorials of the New York Chamber of Commerce and the American Institute of New York, beg leave to submit the following report:

The joint resolutions offered by the committee propose nothing more than the recognition by the Government of the United States of the eminent services rendered by Mr. Joseph Francis to the cause of humanity by furnishing an avenue of escape from a watery grave to the thousands of unfortunate beings who are yearly cast away on the shores of the oceans and great lakes.

Previous to the invention of the life-saving appliances of Mr. Francis the wreck of a vessel on the storm-swept shores of the sea was certain death to all or nearly all on board. In early life his attention was attracted to the great loss of life and property along the Atlantic coast. His heart was moved to sympathy for the large number of helpless beings who were yearly swept away, and his active genius set to work to provide some means by which they might be transported in safety from the vessel to the shore. Encouraged by the partial success of his early efforts, he persevered in making improvement after improvement, until his inventive genius culminated in the construction of the first perfect life-car in the year 1848. It was not, however, until January, 1850, that he had an opportunity to test the efficiency of his invention. At that time "the British ship Ayrshire, having become disabled, was driven on shore at Squan Beach during a terrific snow-storm. She had two hundred and one souls on board, and after striking the beach lay there stranded, the sea breaking over her and the surf rolling in so high that it was impossible for any boat to reach her."

Through the instrumentality of the mortar and line a hawser was stretched from the shore to the ship, and along this passway the life-car made frequent trips, until two hundred out of the two hundred and one persons on board were carried over the boiling surf in safety to the land.

This successful experiment at once brought Mr. Francis and his life-car into prominence before the civilized world. Everywhere, except in his own country, his services in the cause of humanity were fitly recognized; and now, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, as the last honor which is to crown his well-spent life, he asks his own Government to award him a suitable testimonial of his worth and life-long devotion to the welfare of his fellow-man. In this request he is sustained by the American Institute of New York and by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, both of which bodies have memorialized "the Congress of the United States to take such action in recognition of the great services to the country and to humanity of Joseph Francis as in its wisdom it may deem most fitting and proper."

Mr. Francis asks no pension or pecuniary reward, but simply some acknowledgment from the Government of his native country of his honorable life and eminent services in the cause of humanity.

In view of these facts the Committee on Commerce beg leave to report the accompanying joint resolution, and recommend its adoption.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I will have to object to the consideration of this joint resolution at the present time, and I will briefly state the reasons——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the resolution is now under consideration, the question being on its passage, it having been already ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I will make a brief explanation of my objection to it.

The SPEAKER. It is debatable.

Mr. SCOTT. The question as to who originated or conceived the idea of the life-saving boat was between Mr. Joseph Francis and Capt. Douglas Ottinger, of the United States Revenue Marine. Some fifteen years ago the Congress of the United States voted to Captain Ottinger, as a reward for the invention and origination of the life-boat, the sum of $10,000, which was a voluntary contribution on the part of the Government of the United States to Captain Ottinger, made entirely without his solicitation.

Now, sir, this resolution is introduced here in behalf of Mr. Francis, and as a reward for the same invention.

Captain Ottinger is a man of over ninety years of age; he has served his country faithfully, and he has had the credit of inventing the life-boat, which invention has been acknowledged by the Congress of the United States by making, as I have said, a voluntary contribution to him of $10,000.

That is the correct history of the life-boat up to date, and now, without giving Captain Ottinger an opportunity of being heard, this resolution is brought in from the Committee on Commerce and reported here to this House for its passage—a resolution which, if adopted, takes the credit of this invention away from the man to whom it properly belongs and gives it to another.

Mr. Speaker, if the Committee on Commerce had given the inventor of this life-boat an opportunity to come before them and to have presented his claim for the credit of the invention I should have raised no objection to the consideration of the matter now. Because he has not had an opportunity to be heard I am compelled to offer my objection, and I hope (and if in order I shall make the motion to recommit it) that it will be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce for further consideration.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania unfortunately misapprehends the nature and scope of this resolution. The origin of this resolution, let me state to him, is a petition from the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York and from the American Institute of the City of New York, both institutions of the most reputable character and of the highest standing throughout the nation, that the services of Joseph Francis be recognized.

The petitions do not pretend to pass judgment upon the services of any other man; and if the gentleman to whom the member from Pennsylvania has referred has already received from Congress recognition and a gift of $10,000, this fact certainly should interpose no objection to a simple recognition of the services rendered by another man, which are in no way in denial or contravention of the claim of the person to whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers.

The name of Joseph Francis, Mr. Speaker, in the State of New York and among mercantile men throughout this country is a household word. In the year 1844 it happened that I myself experienced the horrors of a shipwreck. My own attention was directed therefore to all appliances for the saving of life from shipwreck, and I recall as though it were but yesterday the intense interest with which the people of the city of New York waited for news of the British ship Ayrshire, which had been disabled and driven ashore on Squan Beach in a terrific storm in January, 1850. Under such circumstances human life had always perished. It was in such a shipwreck that Margaret Fuller went down, and mankind was deprived of one of the most brilliant characters it had ever produced. But in 1850 Joseph Francis had perfected his life-boat and furnished the Government at his own charge with all of the appliances needed for making the necessary tests, by means of which a hawser was thrown to the Ayrshire, the life-car was connected with the ship, and two hundred out of the two hundred and one lives exposed to peril were saved.

It was, Mr. Speaker, the first instance in the history of shipwreck that such a thing had been accomplished. Mr. Francis received a perfect ovation. I remember well going to him myself and thanking him from the bottom of my heart for this great and humane invention. From that hour shipwrecks lost very much of their terror upon our American coast. Mr. Francis went with his invention to Europe and was greeted with honors wherever he went; England, France, Russia, all received him with welcome and commendation, accepting his inventions and acknowledging their worth to humanity. But from his own country alone he has never received official recognition. Now in his old age, and he is eighty-five years of age, he comes here not of his own motion, but on a request of two great commercial bodies of this country, and asks that this simple and well-deserved tribute be granted to him. He does not want to deprive of his full share of credit any other man who is entitled to it. I do not want to take away one single item of credit that may justly belong to the officer to whom my friend from Pennsylvania refers. But as to the merits of Joseph Francis, there is no word of mine that can enhance them, and if they were personally known to this House as they are to me and my constituents, certainly no objection would have been raised on this floor to the passage of this resolution.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to one more fact. Mr. Francis's whole life has been devoted to the construction of life-saving machines. There has not been a movement made, either on this continent or in Europe, for the past twenty-five years, in connection with this subject, that Mr. Francis has not been perfectly conversant with. As I said in the remarks I have just made, when the question as to who was the inventor of the surf-boat was made, it was sent to the Congress of the United States to decide as to who was that inventor. Mr. Francis then had full opportunity to appear before the committees of this House and put in his claim. He did not do so. He made no such claim, but he allowed the Congress of the United States to pass a bill, as I have stated, contributing $10,000 to the man who had invented the surf-boat.

Sir, the $10,000 the Congress of the United States donated to that old man was nothing to him in comparison to the reputation he wanted to leave to his children, that he had invented the surf-boat by which all these lives had been saved and by which all the lives in the future will be saved.

But the passage of this joint resolution robs that old man of the credit to which he is entitled and puts it into the hands of one who was not the inventor and whom the Congress of the United States has decided was not the inventor.

Mr. HEWITT. Will my friend from Pennsylvania kindly state whose life-boat it was that saved two hundred out of two hundred and one lives on the ship Ayrshire in the year 1850, the first time that ever the life-car was used for such purpose?

Mr. SCOTT. That is the question.

Mr. HEWITT. Who built that car?

Mr. SCOTT. In one minute.

Mr. HEWITT. Who furnished it?

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer your question if you will wait one minute. I would not leave that question to the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, or to any other commercial body. It is a question that must be submitted and decided by proof and by evidence, and not by an ex parte conclusion such as your committee or your commercial bodies in the city of New York arrived at.

Mr. HEWITT. My friend does not answer my question. Who built the life-car? Who furnished the life-car that saved two hundred out of the two hundred and one lives on the ship Ayrshire in 1850?

Mr. DINGLEY. My friend from New York will pardon me for a moment to make an inquiry. As I understand it this joint resolution does not refer to the discoverer of the surf-boat.

Mr. HEWITT. I have already stated, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it does not pretend to determine the question of invention, but simply recognizes the services that Mr. Francis has rendered to humanity in connection with life-saving inventions.

Mr. DINGLEY. And does not refer specifically as to who made the invention?

Mr. HEWITT. Not at all.

Mr. SCOTT. I beg pardon. The report of this committee absolutely specifies and says what this joint resolution is for.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to have the joint resolution read again.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the joint resolution will be again read.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. HEWITT. I think it will be apparent to every member of the House that the joint resolution does not enter into the question of title at all to any particular invention.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from New York pardon me for a moment? Is there anything in the report which alludes to it?

Mr. HEWITT. Nothing so far as I can understand the report. It speaks of this invention of Mr. Francis as having been used in 1850. It was so used. It does not refer to any other invention. If any other was then used I never heard of it; and if so this does not refer to it.

Mr. DINGLEY. It refers to the life-car.

Mr. HEWITT. Yes, to the life-car and not to the surf-boat.

Mr. SCOTT. I will raise no objection to the passage of the joint resolution if the life-car is not in the report. If the report of the committee does not expressly give to Mr. Francis, and say so, the reputation of being the inventor of the life-car, then I withdraw all objection to it.

Mr. HEWITT. There is nothing in the joint resolution upon which we have to vote that relates to it. As the subject must be understood by all members I will now demand the previous question.

Mr. SCOTT. I will make the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit is pending.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Do we vote on the report or on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The question now before the House is on the motion to recommit the joint resolution.

Mr. HAMMOND. The final vote will be on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The final vote will be on the passage of the resolution.

The question being taken on the motion to recommit, there were—ayes 56, noes 76.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. HEWITT moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I rise to ask a change of reference of the bill (S. 699) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue to George K. Otis duplicates of certain land-warrants lost while in the possession of the officers of the Government.

That bill has been referred to the Committee on Claims. The same bill is before the Committee on Public Lands of the House, which twice passed upon it in former Congresses. I desire a change of the reference, so that the bill shall go to that committee.

The SPEAKER. To what subject does the bill relate?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It relates to the matter of a patent for public lands.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection.

PROPERTY TAKEN BY FEDERAL ARMS.

Mr. GEDDES. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on War Claims. I am directed by the committee to report back with an adverse recommendation the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to report at the earliest date practicable the names of all persons whose property was taken possession of in Louisiana by the Federal authorities during the late war between the States, the amount of rents collected from said property, and the disposition made of said rents by the Government, including all such information relating to the following-named persons: Mayronne Brothers, plantation in Saint Charles Parish; heirs of Trasimond Landry, plantation in Ascension Parish; I. and S. Ellis, plantation in Terre Bonne Parish; J. R. Groves, property in New Orleans; S. W. and B. S. Story, property in New Orleans; R. H. Short, property in New Orleans; heirs of P. A. Rost, plantation in Saint Charles Parish; heirs of Samuel Jamison, New Orleans; Wid. B. Bragg, plantation in La Fourche Parish; C. F. Caruthers; heirs of Adam Giffin, property in New Orleans; Duncan F. Kenna, plantation in Ascension Parish, and one hundred others.

The resolution was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PAY OF POSTAL CLERKS.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, have had the same under consideration, and report the same back to the House with an amendment, and as amended recommend that the resolution be passed.

"Whereas the act of March 3, 1885, appropriated the sum of $4,682,300 for the payment of railway postal clerks for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886; and

"Whereas $81,300 of such appropriation was made for the purpose of enabling the Postmaster-General to pay the postal clerks of class 4 and 5 the sum and salary of $1,200 and $1,400 respectively for the year ending June 30, 1886: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he hereby is, directed to inform this House what portion of the said sum of $81,300 has been used for the purpose aforesaid; and if no portion of said sum has been so applied, why the same has been withheld, and whether any portion of said sum has been used for other purposes."

The amendment recommended by the committee was to insert, after the word "whereas," where it occurs the second time, the words "it is alleged that," so that it will read, "whereas it is alleged that $81,300," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. BURROWS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, also reported back adversely the memorial of Asa Faulkner and others, of Tennessee, asking compensation for the value of a cotton factory and materials destroyed by military orders; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, is not the regular order the disposition first of the business that has come over unfinished from last Friday?

The SPEAKER. That will come up immediately after the rising of the Committee of the Whole.

The motion of Mr. SPRINGER was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 822) for the relief of William H. Wheeler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay William H. Wheeler, of Warren County, Kentucky, the sum of $633.50, for quartermaster's stores furnished the United States Army in the year 1862, and used by said Army.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the desk to be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the words "six hundred and thirty-three dollars and fifty cents," in lines 6 and 7, insert the words "in standard silver dollars."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will preface what I have to say on the subject under consideration by expressing my regret that gentlemen representing my own political faith have seen proper to anticipate our party opponents in their criticisms of the first Democratic President and Secretary of the Treasury who have occupied those positions in the past twenty-five years. And I desire further to say, in justice to a large majority of the gentlemen who differ with me politically, and who represent their party in both branches of Congress, that I do not believe they would so far ignore facts as to intimate that "the organizations of wealth have succeeded in alarming the President and Secretary of the Treasury, as they have done in several previous administrations."

If the language employed in this connection means anything at all it must be construed to mean that the President and Secretary of the Treasury are under the influence of capitalists, whose interests are supposed to be antagonistic to those of the productive classes and wage-workers. What facts susceptible of such construction have been submitted in proof of the charges or insinuations uttered? They seem to me to rest only upon the bare, unsupported statements of those who promulgated them. Have the President and Secretary of the Treasury in any respect violated the law as it exists to-day? Have they not conformed to its very letter? Can we not concede to them as much honesty and integrity in the views they entertain upon this subject as we claim for ourselves, and can we not presume them to be as desirous as we ourselves are of doing what is for the best interests of the people? It is true that they have recommended the suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar under the provisions of the act of 1878, but can any one say that such recommendations may not ultimately prove to be as wise and as well calculated to promote the public good as its continued coinage has been shown by practical experience to have been of doubtful advantage?

The charge has been made that the Secretary of the Treasury is inimical to silver, for the reason, it is alleged, that he has not paid out silver in the Treasury for the retirement of Government bonds. Let us see how far this theory accords with the process of redemption. The Government provides three grades of money, all of equal purchasing power in the market. To maintain this equality is one of the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury. Let us suppose I have $10,000 of Government bonds. I am required, when they are called, to present them for redemption at the Treasury of the United States in Washington. I am not paid for them in money, but I receive a check, say upon the subtreasury in New York, or upon some other United States depository where the money of the Government is kept. This check does not describe the kind of money I shall receive; it simply calls for $10,000. It is optional with me to demand either gold, silver, or paper. But if, under instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, the disbursing officers are commanded upon the face of the check to pay me in silver, would I not have a right to infer that the Government was endeavoring to force upon me a coin which intrinsically did not represent $10,000 in true money? By arbitrarily compelling me to take silver, when under existing laws gold, silver, and United States notes are understood and declared to be of equal value, and so treated in all payments by the Treasury, would not such action on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury tend to discredit silver, and would he not be derelict in his duty, which requires him to do all that it is in his power to do to maintain the three kinds of money on a parity? The Treasury Department has not discriminated against silver, as it would have done had such a policy been pursued; but on the contrary the Secretary has endeavored to uphold it by refusing to arbitrarily compel those who do not want it to take it, and for which there is no law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I care nothing about those who hold the present bonded obligations of the Government, or what they are paid in; this is a question entirely foreign to the subject we are discussing; but I do care about the honor and credit and good name of the country. We all know that a nation's credit rests entirely upon a strict and honest fulfillment of its promises. The power of the Government is supreme. It can repudiate all its outstanding obligations, if it so desires, and there is no remedy for those who may be injured by the act save that which Congress may provide as a remedy for any injustice that may have been done. Inasmuch as a citizen can not sue the Government as he can his fellow-citizen to obtain justice, it devolves upon us, the representatives of the people, to fulfill to the minutest detail the pledges and promises made in its behalf. Any other policy than this must result not only in the demoralization of national credit, but in inculcating in our people a debased standard of morality which can not but result in the injury of all.

Congress in the year 1878 passed a law over the veto of the President of the United States which, I think, practical experience has since demonstrated was in violation of economic principles, and the aim of which was to do something beyond the power of Congress to do. This law provided that the mints of the Government should coin and the financial officers of the Government should issue and maintain in circulation a coin known as the standard dollar, purporting to contain silver of the value of 100 cents, whereas the fact is universally known that its metallic value to-day is less than 80 cents of its face value. And now because these gentlemen, charged under the law with the duty of carrying out this Utopian financial idea, realize that it is impossible for them to accomplish all that was intended, although having faithfully executed the provisions of the law, they are now held responsible by the authors of the act of 1878 for the want of confidence on the part of the people in and the non-circulation of this coin.

Sir, with as much propriety might those who by their votes in 1861 authorized the issue of the first greenback, the purchasing power of which subsequently declined to about 40 per cent. of its face value, have held that the officers of the Government whose duty it was to print and issue them were responsible for their depreciation as for gentlemen to make the accusation to-day that the President of the United States and Secretary of the Treasury are responsible for the distrust now existing with respect to our standard silver dollar.

Why, then, by inference and insinuation, charge the President and Secretary of the Treasury with being influenced by organizations of wealth, and not by their convictions of what is best for the people? Do the gentlemen making such charges claim that the President and Secretary of the Treasury are less intelligent than they are; that all the virtue and patriotism in the party is embodied in themselves or those who think as they do, and that those who differ from them are actuated by sordid and mercenary motives?

The question is so closely allied to that principle of good government which involves our national honor that its discussion should not only be conducted with fairness but with the most liberal deference to the opinions of others. It must be presumed that all are equally sincere in their desire to reach a satisfactory solution of our troubles, and certainly it is the honest opinion of many that by the continued coinage of the standard silver dollar we are drifting into the evils inevitably resulting from the excessive supply of an inferior quality of money. The ablest advocates of bimetallism and the use of silver by international accord throughout the civilized world have for at least two years past strongly urged the suspension of coinage by the United States as in their judgment the only practical means to that end. Gresham's theory that poor money will run out good money can hardly be disputed in this age; experience has fully demonstrated its truth.

And, sir, I make bold to state another theory, that if there be in circulation a good dollar and a poor dollar the rich man will always get the good dollar and the poor man the poor dollar. If public policy requires that all dollars should be poor in order to rob the creditor class of our people in favor of the debtor I appeal to this House to in some way protect the man who earns his bread and supports his family by his daily labor, and when he asks for bread not to give him a stone. How this can be done in any better way than by giving the rich and poor alike a good dollar I do not know; but protect, in God's name, the poor man. The rich man can take care of himself. He needs no sympathy, nor is he entitled to any.

Gentlemen believing that a silver dollar of 412½ grains is the equivalent of a gold dollar can undoubtedly accomplish this. They are prolific in theories; practical experience has no attractions for them.

WHAT CONSTITUTES TRUE MONEY?

Mr. Chairman, I will endeavor to state briefly what, in my judgment, true money is; for I hold we can never solve the question we are now considering until we first reach a correct conclusion in this respect. Probably no one principle of government has been so liberally discussed as that which pertains to money; and yet, if we may judge by the diversity of opinions maintained not only in this country, but in the world, by gentlemen equally intelligent, and, I hope, equally honest and desirous of arriving at such a solution of the problem as shall prove to be for the best interests of the people, we are no nearer a correct understanding of what true money really is than were those who lived in the time of Aristotle. That eminent philosopher, writing three centuries before Christ, reveals the existence of a controversy even in that day when he asks, "Is not money an imaginary wealth, its value wholly in law? If the government which admits it into circulation changes, where is its real value?"

There are those sitting around me who, notwithstanding the lapse of two thousand years between that age and this, have not advanced a single step from this theory. And in distinct opposition to the view thus expressed a learned Chinese statesman and author, May Twan Lin, in the thirteenth century of our own era, in describing money as a measure of value for all commodities, declared that "it should have an intrinsic metallic worth corresponding to the nominal indicated by the legend at which the coin is brought into circulation." Here we are met by the opposing views of two men of almost equal eminence in their respective countries, and though they differ so widely upon the question of what constitutes true money both theories have their earnest advocates in the discussions of the present time.

What, then, is true money? Is it a representative of value made so by law? Is its value based upon desire, or has it an intrinsic value of its own? If, by intelligent deductions from the experience of those who have preceded us in past ages, the nations of the world, or the people even of our own country, could to-day meet together upon some common ground of understanding as to what true money is, the solution of the question would be far less difficult.

All civilized and semi-civilized people, embracing as well the nations of the East, have at some period of their history employed some two or more of four kinds of metals as money, namely, gold, silver, copper, and iron. I eliminate from this list the conch shells and wampum of the savages; and I state it also as a proposition that such nations and peoples, as they have advanced in intelligence and wealth, have marked their growth and development by a desire to improve their money and better adapt it to meet the demands of an advanced civilization.

In discussing this question I do not propose to consider paper money, even when redeemable in coin, much less fiat paper money, but to confine myself to metallic money exclusively. Paper money first originated in China prior to the thirteenth century of our own era, and the definition given to it then is I think applicable to-day. It was known as "the stretching of money," and that is the name under which it goes to-day in China. It was used as a means of economically transporting specie, and in the nature of a receipt for tea, salt, and temporarily balancing accounts.

History, as I have said, records the use of four metals as money, namely, gold, silver, iron, and copper. But the issue has gradually narrowed, until to-day it is useless to deny that an irrepressible conflict for the determination of the question "What is true money?" and based upon the Darwinian theory of the survival of the fittest, is being waged between gold and silver. This conflict is not incident alone to this century; it has apparently prevailed throughout all ages. At no period of the world's history can it be shown that gold and silver have been of equal value, or that any ratio fixed by law for the purpose of establishing a relative value in the form of metallic money has been accepted by the world in its transactions in gold and silver bullion.

Gold has always been the most valuable metal, and in the nature of things must always be so. In the early dawn of civilization this conflict was between copper and silver, and copper had to succumb; then between silver and gold, and in every instance gold as a metal established its superiority and became at last the only standard with those nations and peoples who first had favored silver and then bimetallism. Such is the history of the world, as I understand it, in connection with metallic money. We may by legislation endeavor to overcome this economic law, but in my judgment we shall never succeed in so doing.

Entertaining the convictions I do in regard to gold, I nevertheless realize how easy it is to be mistaken, however honest one may be. I also recognize the fact that we are to-day on a bimetallic basis, with a silver circulation of about $203,000,000, not including fractional silver pieces. If in the future it shall be demonstrated that a gold standard is better for us, the present amount of silver in circulation would not necessarily entail a loss so serious as to materially affect us as a nation. If, on the other hand, bimetallism should become the standard of the world, we would then be in harmony with that theory; and should this fact become established, we could then renew the coinage of our silver dollars. It is because I recognize these possibilities that I am in favor of bimetallism at the present time, although I am a believer in the superiority of gold as a standard of value.

Therefore I believe it is the best policy and in the line of our interests to place ourselves in such a position, not only with respect to ourselves of to-day, but with respect to those who come after us, that at the least possible pecuniary sacrifice to our people the nation may adopt such a policy as practical experience may prove to be for our highest and best interests as a people. For this reason, sir, I favor bimetallism as the best policy for us to adhere to at this time, and neither gold nor silver monometallism, provided the further coinage of the standard silver dollar can be regulated by the requirements of trade and the expressed will of the people, and not through the operations of an arbitrary law.

I have no fear that our present gold dollar, our unit of value of 25.8 grains, nine-tenths fine, can not be in the future always exchanged for our silver dollar of 412½ grains, worth to-day less than 80 cents; and I do believe that if we continue the coinage of our present silver dollar beyond the amount which the people want, no power under heaven except the fact that the Government or some one will give you a gold dollar in exchange for it will maintain its purchasing power, not only in our own country but in the markets of the world; and without this convertibility of the silver dollar, if silver should ever become your only standard, its purchasing power will simply be the value of the silver bullion in it.

It is for this reason, sir, that I say "let the people decide the question." They are the most interested in it; they are eventually to lose or gain by its proper solution, and ought to and do know what they do or do not want.

Gentlemen differing with me on the subject of unlimited coinage start out with the proposition that the present standard silver dollar of 412½ grains is true money, whereas in intrinsic value it represents less than 80 cents of the money of the world. The same gentlemen insist that the fiat power of the Government makes it equal in value to our present gold dollar. Must they not present the same argument if the 20 per cent. deficiency of to-day shall in a few years become 50 per cent. through the decline in the value of the metal? They will not permit us to turn back and demonstrate the truth or falsity of their position. They simply tell us that it is the poor man's money. I can only reply that in my judgment it will be poor enough, indeed, when the Government, after stamping upon its face the statement that it is a dollar, will not give you a gold dollar for it.

Sir, no gold monometallist denies that the purchasing power of the present standard silver dollar of 412½ grains is to-day equal to a gold dollar, but we do deny, sir, that this state of affairs grows out of the fact that the Government has stamped it a dollar and makes it a legal tender as such. This condition of affairs arises solely from the fact that the Government receives it as the equivalent of a gold dollar; and if the Government should stamp 412½ grains of copper and receive it as the equivalent of a gold dollar, its purchasing power would equal the present gold or silver dollar so long as we are on a bimetallic basis. But, sir, if silver monometallism should become our standard, the purchasing power of the silver dollar of to-day will eventually fall to the value of the metal in it; and such would be the case if our present silver dollar was of copper or of iron, measured as they then would be by a gold standard.

But gentlemen assert that the Government will always be able to redeem it. This may be so, and I admit that so long as the work of redemption continues the coin will be the equivalent of a gold dollar. But when I ask how the Government is to redeem it if the necessary gold to enable it to do so does not come in through our custom-houses, I am told that the Government can issue bonds and buy gold. But, sir, the supporters of that proposition are to-day censuring the Administration because it is not using the unemployed balances in the Treasury for the retirement of our outstanding bonds. They seem to repudiate the theory that "a public debt is a public blessing," and yet they propose that our bonded debt may be increased, if necessary, to the end that a debased currency shall be forced upon the people who do not want it. Is there any consistency in such reasoning?

Again I ask, what is true money? Is it credit? Is it faith? Is it a token? Does it or should it possess an intrinsic value of its own, so that when received or paid for labor or commodities a just and equitable return may be realized and all risk of loss growing out of such exchange of values eliminated? To my mind the proposition is so simple that I can not comprehend the difference of opinions of gentlemen much more learned than I am. True money, sir, is not credit; it is not faith; nor does it derive its value from desire alone; nor is it a token. A representative of money may derive its fiat worth from law, but a higher law, one beyond the scope of any legislative power the world has ever known, will determine its purchasing power, and the sooner we recognize this fact and shape our policy in conformity to this economic law, the sooner will we, in my judgment, arrive at a true solution of this question.

We know that nature has established laws immutable in the physical world, and as these laws are developed and understood by man, and the nearer he is brought into harmony with them, the greater is his development and the more is his welfare promoted. True money that will stand, as it has been said, the ordeal of fire; that money which is based upon and which derives its value from a fixed standard supported by the natural law of supply and demand, that money which is the least susceptible to fluctuations in value, not only in this century, but for all time to come, must be the world's money of the future.

In my judgment, the metal which conforms to this standard can not be other than gold produced by manual labor. Therefore, in my opinion, the world's money must represent within itself an element of manual labor of average uniformity of value, whether performed by Roman slaves in the mines of the Roman Empire, by the Spaniards in the mines of Peru or of Mexico, or by our own people in the gulches of California. Furthermore, I can not but be impressed with the idea, though it may be an illusion, that a fixed amount of manual labor which is engaged in producing a metal to be used as money, and which mankind requires to lessen their labor and to meet the general necessities of life, is the only true representative of exchangeable values. The more unchangeable and uniform the metal employed as the representative of the manual labor of the character described, whether it be of this century or of past centuries, the better it is adapted for exchanges of other labor and other values throughout the world.

Gold to-day represents, has always represented, and, I believe, always will represent a greater and more unchangeable amount of manual labor performed than silver, and in a smaller compass than is possible in any other metal that can be used as money. It is better suited, under the operation of natural laws, for the purposes for which it is used than any other metal; and possessing these characteristics, both natural and economic, it is better adapted for the exchange of other labor and commodities in the larger transactions of our commercial and financial life than silver can ever possibly become.

In using the word "labor" I have prefixed the word manual, for I desire to make a distinction between purely manual labor as a basis of exchangeable value and that class of labor which is supplemented by the ingenuity of man; for I claim that the economic law governing the production of gold is not the same as that which applies to silver. If it were possible for men to create true money, then indeed would we have discovered the philosopher's stone. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread" is as true to-day as when first uttered centuries ago.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I will close what I have to say in regard to true money with what seems to me to be a perfectly plain illustration. The economic laws governing its movement should be identical in their character with those natural laws which control the tides of the ocean. It should freely flow into and out of the nations of the world, under the operation of the law of supply and demand, just as the vacuum caused by the ebb-tide on one shore must, in the nature of things, be filled by the returning waters of the flood-tide from the opposite shore. Furthermore, the money employed in this service should be strictly uniform in density, purity, and metallic value. It should be as unvarying in its qualities as the imperial gallon, which is the world's basis of standard measure of capacity for all goods not sold by heaped measure, and which was originally determined by weighing in air 10 pounds avoirdupois of distilled water at a temperature of 62 degrees Fahrenheit's thermometer, with the barometer at 30 inches.

In my judgment we might as well assume that different nations should at their pleasure use waters of varying qualities of density and purity for the determination of the standard gallon, and attempt to maintain strict uniformity in liquid measurement in trade and commerce as to hope to preserve a fixedness of true metallic values in money nominally representing a certain aggregation of units but in fact possessed of varying degrees of intrinsic worth and representing various and widely varying amounts and kinds of labor. When we shall have reached this degree of uniformity in relation to the money of the world we will have a money which under the operation of both natural and economic laws will best fulfill not only our own requirements as a nation but the requirements of every other nation of the world.

SUBSIDIARY MONEY.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is a well-known fact that all nations have maintained at least two classes or grades of metallic money; one for their larger transactions, and recognized in the foreign exchanges as the money of the world, and another for their subsidiary or smaller exchanges of value in dealings within themselves.

It appears to me to be in accordance with the principles of economic law that a metal to meet the requirements of one purpose is not necessarily that which is best adapted for the other, and that confusion and instability in commercial transactions must follow among any people who adopt such metals as a double standard.

In my judgment the violation of this law by European nations working under the Latin Union is one of the causes of the difficulties under which they are now laboring, and to a like origin I think we can trace the difficulties under which we in this country are likewise laboring to-day. But is there not a law which has governed the use of metallic money for limited transactions as well as the use of a different metal for the larger commercial and foreign exchanges? The economic laws governing a subsidiary coinage, and those governing the money of the world, are not, in my judgment, the same; or at any rate they are only relatively the same. I do not deem it necessary, therefore, that the same economic law should be applied to a metal used in subsidiary coinage as that which applies to the world's money, or for the larger transactions of the people as distinguished from their smaller transactions. I think that experience and history teach us that it is not necessary.

The subsidiary coin of a people need not necessarily represent an intrinsic metallic value equal to the value for which it is proposed to be exchanged, and although the nearer it approaches to a true representation of manual labor, the more desirable it is. Its value or purchasing power is more dependent upon its volume, and upon the fact whether it is issued in excess of or fails to meet the requirements of the people for their smaller exchanges, than upon its intrinsic value, if money possesses an inherent value. Consequently, whatever metal may be used for this purpose should be so divisible that its units of metallic value can be subdivided into fractional parts in conformity to the prices of labor, and not so cumbersome as to cause inconvenience to those who have to use it. It should be a legal tender to a limited extent, approximating, relatively, to the maximum values for which it is to be exchanged. It should not be redeemable by the government issuing it, until abrasion has affected it; for if redeemable at the national treasuries the volume in circulation would no longer be governed by the requirements of the people and the uses for which it was intended, but on the contrary, when the demand for money used in larger transactions became less than the amount needed by the country in the ordinary conduct of business, the subsidiary coinage would be converted by the holders in order to meet this demand.

The holder of subsidiary money should always be able to convert it under the laws of supply and demand alone, into the world's standard, the reasons for such convertibility existing only in the fact that those who give you the world's money for it can use it to meet their own wants or the wants of others, and strictly within the bounds of trade. In other words, the Government provides various grades of money for the convenience of its people. That which is purely subsidiary in its character is especially designed for use within the country where it is issued. It should be in constant circulation among the people, and under no possible condition of affairs should its intrinsic value be such that it could be exported from the country where it is used. Such a coinage will then meet the requirements for which it is intended to be utilized.

It is upon this theory that the copper cash of China fills all the requirements of the Chinese people, but it would not meet the wants of European nations or the United States, where labor and prices are so much higher than in China, as the cash of China would be too cumbersome. And yet a subsidiary coinage possessing the same characteristics as the Chinese copper cash, which is about the equivalent of one-fifteenth part of one of our cents, is as necessary to us as the copper cash is to the Chinese people. If, then, I ask, sir, what metal is best adapted for our subsidiary purposes, the answer must, I think, be silver.

There is nothing more important, Mr. Chairman, to the wage-worker and those who live on fixed incomes than steady employment, uniformity in the price of wages and in the price of commodities and the necessaries of life for the support of both classes. A sudden influx of even true money will, it is well known, affect all values; and until such influx can be provided for through investment, and values can readjust themselves upon a normal basis, fluctuations not only in the price of all commodities but in the value of money itself must be the inevitable result. But where this influx consists either wholly or in part of fiat money, as contrasted with the money of the world, and is issued in excess of the requirements for which it is especially created, the fluctuation in the value of such money, measuring as it does other values, causes greater disturbance and unsettles the values of commercial transactions throughout the country to a more extended degree than if the excess or influx consists of true money. Such would be the condition of affairs if subsidiary money should be issued in excess of the natural requirements of trade.

There appears to be an economic law which adjusts itself to all people similarly situated, and which governs the subsidiary coinage of nations and the amount that can be so used, and I am led to this conclusion by an investigation into the subsidiary coinage of England, France, Germany, and the United States. If we attempt to divide what may be properly designated the money used for the smaller transactions of Great Britain, France, Germany, and the United States from the world's money we can not but be impressed by the figures and the results as shown by statistics. The subsidiary coinage of England consists entirely of silver, there being no bank notes under the denomination of $25, and the highest denomination of silver is practically a half-crown, equivalent to about 50 cents in our money.

We find by a report of Mr. Freemantle, superintendent of the English mint, that this subsidiary coinage in 1885 amounted to $96,731,420. If divided pro rata among the estimated population of Great Britain, it gives a per capita circulation of $2.68. Although the subsidiary coinage of England is of less metallic value than our own, and although it is only a legal tender to the amount of $10, yet it is at all times exchangeable for its equivalent in gold. This arises from the simple fact that it is not issued in excess of the requirements of trade, and therefore no distinction is made in its value. When we come to the United States we find an economic law which appears to govern our subsidiary coinage.

And, further, we have to recognize the fact that our present standard dollar is also in its effect a subsidiary coin, and used in the smaller exchanges of our internal affairs. We are also compelled to treat the one and two dollar bills as used in a similar capacity. We find by the report of the Director of the Mint that—

The total coinage of silver dollars on July 1, 1885, was		$203,884,381
Fractional silver		74,939,820
Total		278,824,201
From this we should deduct silver certificates, for which the United States held an equivalent amount of silver, of the denomination of $10, and which are not used strictly for subsidiary purposes	$140,323,140
Fractional silver held by the Treasury and not in circulation	31,236,899
Leaving an aggregate of actual silver in circulation of		107,264,162
If we add to this United States and national-bank notes outstanding as of October 31, 1885, of the denomination of $1 and $2		46,711,593

which may properly be considered as our subsidiary coinage; and if this is divided pro rata among a population of 57,000,000 it shows a per capita circulation of $2.69, or a difference between England and the United States of only 1 cent per capita. These are not the results of legislation, but the operation of economic laws left to themselves.

As to Germany, we find from a report of a committee of the House of Commons on the cause of the depreciation of silver, page 26 of a paper put in by Mr. Peitsch in regard to Germany's subsidiary coinage, that the amount per capita is 10s., or about $2.40, on an estimated population of 42,000,000. Undoubtedly the fact that the old one-thaler piece, a coin which has not been entirely withdrawn from circulation in Germany, and recoined as provided for under existing laws, has had some effect on the subsidiary coin now in use; but with the thaler yet in use, an apparent difference of only 28 cents per capita is shown to exist between Germany, England, and the United States.

When we come to France the same difficulty confronts us with reference to the five-franc piece, as that which exists in Germany with respect to the thaler. The amount of subsidiary and copper coins now in circulation in France, including her dependencies, is equivalent to eight francs or about $1.60 per capita, or five of silver and three of copper. Whatever deficit may appear in the subsidiary coinage of France is undoubtedly supplemented by the circulation of five-franc pieces. But it is reasonable to suppose that their requirements do not vary materially from what is shown to be the requirements of Great Britain, Germany, and the United States, although prices in France, as compared with the United States, may have some effect on the volume required.

Now, sir, I affirm unhesitatingly that our silver dollar, whether containing 412½ grains of silver or of an increased weight (although it is too cumbersome for such uses, as has been demonstrated in England by its equivalent, the crown piece), can only be a subsidiary coin in this country; and if coined and put into circulation to meet the requirements of a higher plane of commercial transactions, it will, from its very nature and characteristics, if issued in quantities sufficient to meet the requirements for which it is issued, so affect our subsidiary coinage as to unsettle and demoralize it. In other words, when the present silver dollar, issued in amounts to meet requirements not only as subsidiary metallic money, but as money required for the higher exchange of values, is in excess of or short of the requirements of either, such a state of affairs must necessarily unsettle and confuse all the smaller exchanges of our country.

If the statements I have given are based upon correct data, and I have endeavored to have them so, it certainly reveals a remarkable uniformity in the per capita requirements of the four nations named, without the aid of the Latin Union to regulate the subject, and when left to the natural laws of supply and demand.

These figures would lead us to believe that this country can use, provided paper money does not enter to interfere with the circulation, about one hundred and sixty millions of dollars of silver for absolutely subsidiary purposes, and no more, in coin subdivided into fractions of a dollar which are the most convenient in size for the uses for which they are intended.

THE EXAMPLE OF FRANCE.

The advocates of a bimetallic standard, or perhaps I may more properly say those who favor silver monometallism, are disposed to point to France as a model of all that is perfect in her methods of finance. But they do not always tell us that France, together with the other nations of the Latin Union, has, since the year 1876, stopped the coinage of five-franc pieces, which in our money is the equivalent of the silver dollar. There is no one problem confronting France and the states of the Latin Union to-day more important or more difficult of solution than that which pertains to their silver coinage. The arguments submitted by gentlemen who urge the continued coinage of silver dollars are usually based upon the condition of affairs in France. They point

First, to the amount of silver in circulation.

Second, to her metallic wealth in both silver and gold.

Third, to her per capita circulation in gold, silver, and paper.

Fourth, to the wealth of the French people as a nation.

Fifth, that we as a nation are so deficient in money to meet our requirements that the continued coinage of silver is a necessity.

Now, while they do not directly make the assertion, they at least leave the impression that the apparent prosperity of France arises from the money it is claimed she possesses, and especially from the freedom with which silver has been coined and circulated in that country. In this connection I desire to submit the following statement from figures furnished by the Director of the Mint for 1884, showing the total as well as the per capita circulation of France, England, Germany, Holland, and the United States:

Table showing the total paper and specie circulated in France, Great Britain, Germany, the United States, and Holland.

From this table it will be seen that France alone of the nations named had a larger alleged circulation per capita in gold, silver, and paper than the United States, being $52.85 as against $36.80 for the United States, $24.86 for England, $18.24 for Germany, and $34.47 for Holland. It will also be observed by this table that France had a metallic circulation of $135,000,000 in excess of the combined metallic circulation of Germany, England, Holland, and the United States. It also shows that France had an alleged metallic circulation nearly three times that of England, being $1,611,000,000, as against England's $696,814,668; about twice that of the United States, which was $820,998,837; three times that of Germany, which was $545,900,000, notwithstanding France's comparatively recent alleged payment of about $1,000,000,000 of gold to Germany to liquidate her war indemnity, and which gentlemen refer to with so much pride when quoting France.

But assuming these figures to be correct, will any gentleman claim that even then there is a deficiency of money in this country? We had, by this table, over twice the money in circulation that they had in England, and the aggregate value of the imports and the exports of England alone for the year 1884 was $3,338,351,608, or the equivalent of $92.82 per capita of her population, and we know that her per capita circulation of $24.86 was ample to meet the requirements of this immense traffic, and it is a well-known fact that the rates charged for the use of money in England are lower than those of any other country in the world. Therefore I claim, sir, that the gentlemen who base their arguments on the continued coinage of our present silver dollar on the ground that we require more money have no just grounds for their arguments if practical experience and not theory is to be our guide.

But, sir, I claim that if France is any example for us to follow as to her per capita circulation in 1884, and that if all her money is true money, when you come to consider the different methods in which business is conducted and the way money is used in this country and in France, we have to-day a per capita circulation equivalent to double that of France, and competent judges estimate it at the equivalent of five times that of France. Ninety per cent. of our entire metallic and paper money is either in active circulation or on deposit in the financial institutions of the country, at all times available to those who require it and can give satisfactory security for it when loaned.

Our system of checks, used by all classes of our community, and which is practically unknown in France, or used only to a very limited extent, more than doubles the volume of our available money. This, together with the further well-known fact that a large proportion of the metallic money of France is in the money-drawers of the people instead of in the Bank of France or its branches, the only banking institutions of that country, and thereby withdrawn from active circulation, I think corroborates my statement.

Sir Robert Peel, in discussing the comparative wealth of France and England in 1840, said:

> In England one person in five spends all his income or his earnings; in France there is scarcely one in forty who does the same; the other thirty-nine make savings.

These habits of thrift and economy are what form the secret of the wealth of the French people, whatever it may be, and not their metallic money, and especially not their silver circulation.

Mr. Chairman, no man, I care not who he is or what his professions may be, takes a greater interest in the welfare of the laboring man than I do. I have been associated with them all my life; they want to get all they can for the labor they give in return, and it is right and just that they should have a liberal return for what they do, to build up and to make this country what it is and what I hope they will make it in the future.

But, sir, glittering generalities and doubtful theories will not alone give the laboring man what he requires to meet his necessities. The man who by his brains, capital, and energy, finds steady employment for the wage-worker, at just wages that will enable him to support his family and lay aside something for a rainy day, is the true and best friend of the man who lives by his labor. Hearing so much as I have about silver being the poor man's money, and France so often quoted as a model for us to follow in connection with silver coinage, my faith in my own convictions in regard to this subject, that our present silver dollar was not the poor man's dollar, but a fraud and a cheat, became shaken; for if it was going to help the poor man, and I could be convinced of the fact, then I would most heartily adopt the views of those with whom I now differ.

France and Belgium are the two principal nations of the Latin Union, and France to-day has a larger silver circulation than all the rest of the European nations and the United States combined. If silver, therefore, is the poor man's money, and as France has the most of it in circulation, the status of the wage worker in France should prove the truth or falsity of this proposition. England being a gold country, with only a subsidary coinage of silver, and the seacoasts of those countries being only some 40 miles apart, and the relative conditions of the two countries being as nearly the same as you can find two peoples, it occurred to me to compare the condition of labor in England with that of France and Belgium, and I submit the following table of the comparative rate of wages paid in England with those paid in France and Belgium, which are silver countries.

Number of trades, 19. Average per cent. paid in England over France, 22 41; average per cent. paid in England over France and Belgium, 27.44.

It will be seen from this table, carefully compiled by an expert statistician from official and other trustworthy sources, that the average rates of weekly wages paid in various parts of England in the year 1884 to persons employed in nineteen trades or occupations exceeded the average rates paid in France during the same year in the same trades 22.41 per cent., and exceeded the average rates paid in the same pursuits throughout France and Belgium 29.49 per cent. In other words, for every $1 paid on an average to nineteen different mechanics or laborers in France 1.22\frac{41}{100}$ was paid in England, and for every $1 paid on an average throughout France and Belgium $1.27½ was paid in England.

I assert that France, notwithstanding her reputed wealth, is to-day in a more wretched condition both financially and commercially than any other of the great nations of the world. It is well known that her population has increased in a smaller ratio than that of any other European country of the first rank, and yet her labor is more poorly paid, although she is without a growing population for which to find employment. Quite recently the public announcement was made that the crown jewels of France are to be sold and the proceeds invested for the maintenance of the poor of that country. I could cite other facts of equal significance if I had the time to do so.

WHAT IS THE TRUE MONEY OF FRANCE?

Now, sir, is it not pertinent to inquire whether the policy of France in connection with her metallic money has always been such as to enable her people to best meet their requirements at the period of their greatest necessities. At the beginning of the war in which the third Napoleon engaged with Germany, the French nation, in order to raise the money with which to carry on that war, was compelled to negotiate a loan in London through the American banking house of J. S. Morgan & Co.

Again, at the termination of the war with Germany, when the French Government appealed to the patriotism of the people, and their loan was taken partly at home and partly abroad, how, and in what form, was the money derived from this loan paid to Germany? The German Empire was unwilling to take silver; it demanded gold. Can any one tell the amount of sacrifice and loss to which the French nation submitted by that transaction because of the fact that of their accumulated wealth of ages in metallic money, so large a portion of it was concentrated in a silver currency, which, when measured by the world's standard, would to-day show a loss of from 20 to 30 per cent. as compared with its fiat value?

And now let us look at the true condition of France in 1874. By a report of M. Leon Say, who had been charged by the French Government with the duty of preparing a report on the payment of the war indemnity and the exchange operations to which it gave rise, we find the following: When the preliminaries of peace were signed at Versailles, February 26, 1871, no mention was made of the kind of money in which the indemnity was to be paid. In the supplementary convention at Ferriere, March 11, the exchange was fixed at 3 francs and 75 centimes per thaler, and 2 francs and 15 centimes per German florin.

The definite treaty of peace, signed at Frankfort May 10, stipulated the different kinds of paper that would be received in payment; but with the exception of thalers and florins, no exchange was fixed, and the English, Dutch, and other non-German paper given in payment was to be converted into German money by Prussia at the cost of the French Government, which was only credited with the sum actually realized after the deduction of exchange and commissions.

The indemnity, including interest at 5 per cent., amounted to $1,060,209,015. After crediting France with the value of certain railways in Alsace and Loraine, the amount of indemnity due Germany was $998,132,093, which was paid by the French Government as follows:

	Francs.	Dollars.
Notes of the Bank of France	125,000,000	25,000,000
French gold coin	273,003,058	54,600,622
French silver coin	239,291,875	47,858,375
German notes and coin	105,039,045	21,007,809

Pounds sterling on England	637,349,832	127,469,967

It will be seen from the foregoing that out of this immense sum of money paid to Germany, France used of her own metallic money only $47,858,375 of silver, and $54,600,611 of gold, and $25,000,000 of the notes of the bank of France. Almost every nation of Europe was called upon in some form or other for metallic or paper money with which to enable her to pay this indemnity. And while she was thus engaged in scouring other countries for bankers' exchange to enable her to pay the debt in the form exacted by Germany, the effect of her own financial disturbances was apparent every day in the prices of French commodities interchangeable for the commodities of other nations.

I would ask, Mr. Chairman, whether the foregoing statement as to how the French indemnity was paid to Germany would not lead one to doubt that France really possessed the metallic circulation claimed for her. But admitting for the sake of argument that she did have in 1874, and that she now has, in circulation the large amount of metallic money shown by the tables, did not there exist some good reason why she was forced to appeal to other nations to assist her in her time of need, when she apparently possessed three times as much metallic money as the nations which she had to call on? Would not one naturally infer that either she did not possess the amount of metallic money that it was claimed she possessed, or, that having it, it was not true money, or of a quality that could be made available in meeting her obligations?

At the date she paid the last of the indemnity to Germany, namely, in September, 1873, the five-franc piece was not equivalent to its nominal value in gold, measured by a bullion standard; and in the following year it showed a greater depreciation; and, sir, it is well understood that had she in 1874 attempted to convert her silver into gold, silver would have shown a greater depreciation than it did show at that time. And if misfortune ever again comes to France, and the conquerer stands upon her soil demanding gold, and she is compelled to convert her silver into the money of the world in order to meet her necessities, she will have to submit to a loss arising from her silver. Even granting that the price of silver bullion in the future should show no decline below the figures of to-day that loss would amount to the sum of over $160,000,000.

But while gentlemen will be forced to admit that France did not pay this one thousand millions in gold as alleged, they will still insist that France did pay the money. This claim can not be denied; but the manner in which its payment was rendered possible affords an interesting subject of inquiry, and one which will demonstrate beyond a question of doubt the correctness of my argument, that the metallic money of France was not used for this purpose. Had not a large and intelligent proportion of the French people recognized the fact that the true wealth of France did not consist in her silver coinage as available money France could not have met that indemnity. This class had invested largely in the securities of other nations. It is estimated by competent judges that the aggregate of such investments in 1874 amounted to $1,000,000,000. More or less of these large foreign holdings were disposed of in the countries in which they were issued, and, being converted into the money of the world, the sum realized was paid over to their Government by the French people, who took the French rentes in return, thus enabling France not only to pay the indemnity, but to maintain her metallic circulation. But if the French people who held these foreign securities had held French silver in lien of them the results would have been entirely different.

Now, sir, if I am correct in my conclusions, is this a country for us to follow? Is it one that gentlemen who believe in bimetallism and a silver standard would hold up to us as one that is best adapted not only for our wants and necessities of to-day, but for the possible contingencies that may meet us as a people in the future? If the gentlemen favoring bimetallism or a continued coinage of the present silver dollar have any basis for their arguments at all, it is that we have not sufficient money in the country to meet our requirements and necessities. I am sure, sir, that the figures I have given will demonstrate that we are at least as well off to-day in this respect as England. If we are to judge from practical results, we are in a better condition than France; and if we have to-day all the money that our necessities demand, this argument falls to the ground.

But the advocates of silver say, "Why should we care for England, Germany, and France. They have only existed as nations about a thousand years; we a little over a century. We can learn nothing from England, but much from France; England can not affect us. Oh, no, sir, they are of no consequence to us; we are not dependent upon them in any respect, nor can they affect our financial interests." And yet when the little bell rings in the Bank of England in Threadneedle street, London, its echo starts the money markets of the world! The results of the policy of the Bank of England may not directly reach the prairies of Texas or the mountains of Missouri; fortunately, they are in the interior of our continent; but our great money centers, located as they are upon our defenseless seacoast, are exposed to such influences; but if affected injuriously, in time the oscillations in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia will be vibrations on the plains of Texas and in the State of Missouri, and from these their people will suffer to a greater or less degree.

WILL THE CONTINUED COINAGE OF SILVER BENEFIT THE COUNTRY?

And now let me ask would an increase of our money from the degree of sufficiency which has been shown to exist result in a more active development of the business of the country? I claim that it would not. In my judgment the effect would be directly the opposite. There would, on the contrary, be a tendency toward a demoralization of business. Suppose the business interests of the country were suffering from a deficiency of money; unquestionably, as soon as this deficiency was supplied there would be a revival in trade. But if the volume of money now is in excess of normal requirements, increasing our circulation with a debased coin can not possibly be of any permanent value to us; it might result in a fictitious increase of values, but the inevitable reaction would follow and in the end the people would be the sufferers.

But may I ask whether gold is not now gradually disappearing from circulation in this country, arising, first, from the fact of the great uncertainty as to its future status; secondly, from the large paper circulation now in existence, and, thirdly, from the fear of silver monometalism, for if we ever come to silver monometalism our paper circulation will not be redeemable in gold, but in silver. A few years ago gold was in circulation everywhere. It was within sight every day. On January 1, however, out of about $550,000,000 in the country, only about half the gold coin could be found either in the banks or in the Treasury. The question is, Where has it gone? Some will claim that it has gone into the arts, but my belief is that it is being hoarded by the people who know its real value.

That we have an abundance of money in the country for our present needs is practically demonstrated by the fact that millions are lying idle to-day with no prospect of early employment. Meanwhile silver is depreciating in value. If the future status of this metal could be foreseen, the principal element of uncertainty would be eliminated. Or if we could judge of the future valuation of silver by its past history in the money transactions of the world, one of the difficulties under which we labor would be removed. But it may be that silver is now undergoing a change, the results of which the wisest of us can not foresee. It is this dangerous uncertainty that has precipitated our present complications.

It is true that from 1834 to 1873, a period of thirty-nine years, 412½ grains of silver, the weight of our standard dollar, did not fall below the value of a gold dollar. In fact, from 1834 to 1873 a silver dollar of this weight commanded a premium of from .2 to as high as 4.6 premium. In 1873 the value of the coin was 101.46 cents, but in the succeeding year, 1874, it fell to 98.86, and has steadily declined from year to year until in 1885 its metallic value as compared with gold was less than 80 cents. Now I ask if there is any gentleman in this House who can say that this decline is going to stop or that silver will appreciate in value from this time forward? If this question can not be answered understandingly one way or the other, what does ordinary prudence and common sense dictate as the best policy for us to pursue? It is, in my judgment, sir, to stop where we are until the future enlightens us as to what is our best policy.

We stand to-day among the first nations of the earth in credit; our 3 per cent. extended Government bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, command a premium, and we could to-day I believe fund the entire bonded indebtedness of the Government into a bond payable in fifty or one hundred years at 2½ per cent. and they would be taken at par and perhaps above par, while English consols, practically irredeemable, paying 3 per cent., command in London 100 1/16. Our credit, sir, is too high; our good faith and honor, not only with our own people but with the people and nations of all the world, too sacred and valuable for us to continue a policy which our own better judgment tells us, and which the experiences and misfortunes of other people and nations confirm, can only end in ruin and disaster.

Although, sir, under the act of 1878 the Government has put its stamp upon 412½ grains of silver, calling it a dollar, and is under no legal obligation to redeem it in the future, yet, sir, the day will come, if the coinage of the present silver dollar is continued until the amount reaches a sum in excess of that which the country needs, when the sentiment of justice and fair and honest dealing among our people will compel your Government to redeem these dollars, not at their metallic value to day, based on 412½ grains of silver worth 80 cents in gold, but at 100 cents in gold; for unless we do this we can never be classed otherwise than as a people who have repudiated their just obligations. This fact is illustrated more emphatically by the sentiment of our people in connection with the trade-dollar of to-day, which contains more pure silver than the standard dollar.

But, sir, many of the speeches made upon this subject appear to be in the form of appeals in favor of the debtor class of our people. Now, sir, we are not all paupers, nor are we all debtors. The great mass of the people are neither debtors nor creditors in the sense in which these terms have been used, but a very large proportion of them have their small earnings deposited in the savings-banks of the country to provide for their old age or when sickness shall overtake them or those dependent upon them.

By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury the bonded debt of the United States on July 1, 1885, amounted to $1,324,229,150. Of this debt there were held by the savings-banks, national banks, State banks, and trust companies (not including life insurance and other labor associations) $664,395,676, or a little over 50 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States.

From the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, we find the gross amount of deposits in the savings-banks of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, District of Columbia, Ohio, Indiana, Minnesota, and California to be $1,095,172,147, deposited by 3,015,151 individuals, which shows an average amount to each depositor of $356.56.

It is well known that savings-banks are not institutions for profit, but are simply conducted in the interest of the laboring classes. It is practically the same with a large amount of Government bonds held by life insurance companies, which it is not necessary for me to discuss here, as the subject is understood by every intelligent man. The small interest this class of our community receives on such savings, as well as the payments eventually to be made on life-insurance policies in the interests of those who are endeavoring to avoid leaving those dependent upon them to the cold charities of the world, are based to a large extent upon Government bonds. Capitalists as a rule are not large holders of Government bonds. They can do better with their money than buying bonds at 124 bearing only 4 per cent. interest.

At the time of the passage of the act of 1878, the value of silver bullion per ounce was $52\frac{2}{16}$, and the metallic value of our silver dollar was 89.30 cents, measured by a gold standard. To-day the metallic value of our silver dollar is 79.21 cents, showing a depreciation of 10.9 per cent. in seven years. But this depreciation has not inured to the benefit of the debtor class. They can not avail themselves of it as long as the present silver dollar can be exchanged for a gold dollar. Their only hope, therefore, is to demonetize gold, leaving silver as the only standard; then not only creditors, but millions of our wage-workers and producing classes will be defrauded out of their just dues and hard earnings 20 per cent. if not more, if silver should further depreciate, regardless of the value of the silver dollar at the time the liability was created.

Is there any justice in this policy? If there is (and I fail to see it), would it not be more manly and more honest to pass a bankrupt law permitting solvent and insolvent debtors to settle their debts at say 50, 75, or 80 cents on the dollar, than to attempt indirectly to accomplish the same ends by a debased currency? Such a policy would at least permit the honest portion of our people to pay their just debts and not force upon them involuntary repudiation.

Sir, I think I know something about the wage-workers of this country. One fact in connection with them is conspicuous: whatever the condition or the necessities of a laboring man may be he will never, as a rule, take the bread from or in any way interfere with his co-worker. They are always found standing shoulder to shoulder together, and any policy that will rob one, although that one may be a citizen of New York, will incur the disapproval of another, though he may be a citizen of Pennsylvania or any other State.

WHAT IS THE TRUE POLICY OF THE SOUTH AND SOUTHWEST?

Mr. Chairman, let us look at this question from a Southern and Southwestern standpoint only. I will endeavor to imagine that I am representing a constituency in that section and that I desire to do conscientiously what I believe will in the end prove to be for their best interests, regardless of all personal considerations. What do the people of the South and Southwest want? The arguments of the gentlemen from those sections are based upon the theory that they require more money.

I have endeavored to show that we already have in this country all the money that the legitimate needs of the country demand; that in fact money is now the cheapest commodity we have, even when compared with the prices at which other commodities of the country are selling. If money was scarce, this state of affairs could not exist, for it would command a higher rate of interest than it does to-day. The South and Southwest want railroads; they want their coal and iron fields developed; they want the great natural advantages they possess for manufacturing developed, their naturally productive soil cultivated, and of which probably not one-eighth is now under cultivation. To accomplish this capital is necessary, and not money in the sense in which they confound the two words. Will an unlimited coinage of silver, which is not true money, supply their wants in this respect; and will the South and Southwest realize their expectations from such policy?

I say, sir, they will not; but the effect will be to check the influx of capital to these sections, which would go there if all the money of the country was good money and there was no doubt or shadow of doubt as to its future intrinsic value. If I have to-day $10,000 of silver which is on a parity with $10,000 of gold, however anxious I may be to loan it, even at a low rate of interest, I will not loan it if there is any uncertainty as to whether I am to receive in return when due anything less than its value when I parted with it. If there is any probability of my being forced to take a depreciated currency, nominally worth $10,000, but intrinsically worth only $8,000, I know I will be better off if I hold my gold and lose my interest than to loan it subject to such a contingency. It is this great fear hanging over the country to-day, which, in my judgment, has done more to bring about the present stagnation in business than any other one fact.

The capital of this country is idle because the people owning it realize the great uncertainty of the future, in connection with the money of the country. The paramount interest of the debtor, if he is an honest debtor and proposes to pay his just obligations, is to hire his money at the lowest possible rates of interest. The rates at which money is being loaned in the United States to-day, are lower than they have ever been in the history of the country. As soon as this money becomes depreciated, its ultimate value uncertain, although it may be fiat money, the rates of interest will immediately advance. The uncertainty of those who are willing to loan it under such a condition of affairs, will cause them to demand a higher rate of interest for this debased money than they otherwise would, to protect themselves as a guarantee against any possible further depreciation in it when paid, and the debtor class of the country will be the greatest sufferers thereby.

It is claimed that the prices of our cotton, our corn, our wheat, and our hog products of to-day are caused by the deficit in the amount of our money. Such a proposition is so absurd that I can not comprehend why any gentleman possessing ordinary intelligence would in this House make such an assertion. He must either be ignorant of the first principles governing the price of these commodities, or else he is endeavoring from personal or some other motive to mislead the constituency he is sent here to represent and serve. The price of our cotton, our grain, our wheat, and all other products is fixed and determined, not by the amount of money we have in this country, but by the price that foreign nations will pay us for the surplus which it is necessary for us to ship out of the country in order to find a market for it, and the money of the United States has nothing more to do with it than the money of any other nation in the world. We do not and we can not consume all of the products I have mentioned, and the export prices of our surplus fixes and determines the home prices of what we do consume; and these prices are to-day and always will be measured by a gold standard, whatever our standard may be. Sir, I beg the pardon of this House for occupying their time in refuting such a ridiculous proposition.

And now, sir, I desire to touch upon another phase of this subject. Any ordinary merchant or business man understands that if he can purchase and pay for any commodity produced by human labor so as to absolutely control it he can fictitiously appreciate the apparent value of such commodity. The difficulty arises when he wishes to dispose of it and to find those who will buy it. On what theory of sound economy and practical common sense can you ask this Government to become, if I may use the expression, the "bull" of the world for the appreciation of silver? We know that its ultimate intrinsic value can only be determined by supply and demand. Why should we assume to appreciate silver any more than to appreciate wheat, copper, or iron? What is the relative production of the silver mines of this country as compared with all other products?

Many of those who are most strenuously advocating the continued coinage of our silver dollar do not believe in the theory of protection; yet it is claimed by other advocates of the measure that we should especially protect our silver industries because this country is the largest producer of that metal. The total amount of silver produced in the United States in 1885 was estimated to be $46,489,930, an amount which hardly equals the value of the petroleum product of a little corner of the State of Pennsylvania.

From the best estimates that can be made from the census of 1880 the valuation of all the products of this country is as follows:

Total value of manufactures	$5,369,000,000
Cereals and potatoes	2,139,000,000
Wool (about)	100,000,000
Butcher meats and other articles not included elsewhere (estimated)	400,000,000
Total	8,000,000,000

Now, sir, the economic question involved in this discussion is simply this: Is the production of this fifty millions of silver in the country of such paramount importance to us as a people as to influence our judgment in arriving at a true and correct solution of the question of what is true money when we know that to a greater or less extent, whether we solve it wisely or unwisely, the larger proportion of the remaining products of the country, amounting to $7,950,000,000, will be affected thereby?

And now I will ask the Clerk to read that which I send to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to regulate the coinage of the standard silver dollar.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all that part of section 1 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character," approved February 28, 1878, which reads as follows: "And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion, at the market price thereof, not less than $2,000,000 worth per month nor more than $4,000,000 worth per month, and cause the same to be coined monthly, as fast as so purchased, into such dollars; and a sum sufficient to carry out the foregoing provision of this act is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. And any gain or seigniorage arising from this coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury as provided under existing laws relative to the subsidiary coinage: Provided, That the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of such resulting coin, shall not exceed $5,000,000," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That whenever the standard silver dollars now in the Treasury of the United States shall, by payments in due course of law, have been reduced in amount to $20,000,000, the Secretary of the Treasury shall set the said sum of $20,000,000 aside in a specific fund, to be known as the "silver coinage adjustment fund." If by payments, upon lawful demands, made from said fund the amount thereof on the last day of any month shall be reduced below the sum fixed as aforesaid, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to coin, in the month next following, standard silver dollars sufficient to bring the said fund up to the sum of $20,000,000; and in every month thereafter the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to coin as many standard silver dollars as shall be necessary to restore the said fund to the sum of $20,000,000, providing it shall have been reduced below that amount in the month immediate y preceding.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase from time to time silver bullion at the market price thereof in such quantities as shall enable him to carry out the provisions of the preceding sections; and a sum sufficient to carry out the foregoing provisions of this act and to pay the expenses of the coinage herein authorized is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and any gain or seigniorage arising from this coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury as provided under existing laws relative to the subsidiary coinage.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, my convictions in regard to this whole subject are based upon the facts or assumed facts to which I have called the attention of the committee. The opinions I entertain upon the question are derived in part from practical experience and observation, but they are also confirmed by what I understand to be the experience of other nations who now or at some period of their history have been similarly situated. The provisions embodied in the bill just read are so simple and so free from ambiguity that the weakest intellect can comprehend them. The measure does not demonetize silver; it does not provide for a stoppage of the coinage of the silver dollar, nor change in any manner its weight or fineness; in fact it raises the maximum of its coinage from $4,000,000 per month, as limited by the act of 1878, to a possible twenty millions per month, if the mints of the Government can coin so much, and if the people of the country want it coined.

Why, then, can not any gentleman on this floor who believes in a bimetallic standard or who favors the continued coinage of the silver dollar vote for it? Will his vote in its favor in any way conflict with his past record? I fail to see that it will. If so, I would be glad to hear the reasons for such an opinion. It is true it leaves the whole question of the future coinage of the silver dollar to the people. Are we afraid to trust them? Are they not better judges of what they want and do not want than we are? Or are three hundred and twenty-five gentlemen on this floor better able to solve this problem than the people themselves?

Let us briefly consider the results of the passage of such a bill from a bimetallic standpoint, and let us see whether it is not more likely in the future to establish bimetallism as the standard of the values of the world than the law which now governs our silver coinage. If such a standard can ever be adopted, will enforced silver coinage on our part result in compelling England and Germany to adopt bimetallism, or induce France and the Latin Union to renew that which they have now stopped, the coinage of their five-franc pieces? Most assuredly it would not, but it would have directly the opposite effect, for such a policy on our part, if continued indefinitely, will sooner or later bring us to a silver standard, and no living man or set of men can determine when the last dollar that will produce this result may be coined.

It will come, sir, like a thief in the night, when least expected, precipitated, undoubtedly, by some convulsion of trade, which no law can anticipate; and when that day comes, and we require every dollar of money we can control to save our people from bankruptcy and ruin, nearly the entire mass of our gold coin, amounting to $600,000,000, will not only be driven from circulation, but out of the country into those countries where gold is the standard, thereby strengthening them in the position they now occupy, leaving us to receive silver for what we export, and pay such nations in gold for what we import.

But suppose we change the existing law, compulsory in its nature, and relegate the whole question to the people, as provided for in the bill, leaving the people's wants to be met by the law of supply and demand, and provide, as this bill does, for giving them all they want, what possible objection can there be to such modification of existing laws? We have now coined about $203,000,000 of the standard dollars, and faith in the value of the present silver dollar now coined, would return. If they ever can find a resting place in the confidence of the people, such a policy would secure that result, and in the near or distant future, when the country requires more silver, and can absorb it, the provisions of this act would furnish it for them.

Would not such a policy place us in the strongest possible position for the accomplishment of the best results in the future? Would it not leave us in the position of a discreet and wise general who, hoping for victory, does not overlook the necessity of providing for a line of retreat in case of disaster? For, sir, if in the future we should become loaded down with silver coinage, as France and the other States of the Latin Union are to-day, and have to retreat, it will be at a sacrifice and loss to the people of this country for which years of labor will not compensate.

Now, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I can not but call the attention of the gentlemen of this House to what they know so well, that our very existence as a nation was based on concession and compromise. The past history of our legislation tells us that where great national interests have been involved, our best and ablest statesmen of all parties have sought by conciliation and compromise to harmonize conflicting interests, and teaches us that there is not and that there can never be any question or sectional interest which our good sense can not settle in such manner as will mete out justice and equity to all.

Realizing as I do the difference of opinion on the part of gentlemen of this House upon this subject, and conceding to all who differ with me as much honesty of purpose and the possession of an equal desire to do only what shall result in the advancement of the best interests of the country as I claim for myself, I have endeavored, in the preparation of this bill, to so frame it that however different our views might be, it would afford a common ground for us to stand upon, and one which, in my judgment, will give satisfaction, as a fair compromise measure, to the people, whatever their individual opinions may be. Our duty to our country demands this.

Mr. DUNHAM and Mr. REED of Maine. Mr. Chairman, what is the business before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] sent up an amendment to the pending bill, and, as the Chair understands, is speaking to his amendment.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Has the amendment been read?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Does it refer to the silver question?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk again read the amendment as above printed.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Ah! I see it is entirely pertinent. [Laughter.]

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, is it in order for the gentleman in charge of this bill to accept the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman. I trust that these interruptions are not to be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] be extended twenty minutes.

Mr. REED, of Maine, Mr. ROGERS, Mr. TUCKER, and other members objected.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, on any other day than private bill day I would make no objection, but I must object to time being consumed on this day in the discussion of the silver question.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat fatigued, and if I can have unanimous consent to print the remainder of my remarks I shall be content.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.]

Mr. GEDDES. I rise, Mr. Chairman, to oppose the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] to pay this little claim in silver.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think we can vote that down. [Laughter.]

Mr. GEDDES. The party for whose relief this bill is reported suffered his loss twenty years ago. He was a loyal man and furnished this property to the Government. The claim is a small one, and, as we never report interest, he can have only the value of the property at the time he parted with it; yet gentlemen now propose to pay this claim in silver. I am opposed to that. As long as I hear so much said in favor of paying the bonds of the Government in gold, I, as a member of the Committee on War Claims, shall resist all these efforts of the gold men to pay these little claims that are reported from time to time in silver. [Applause.]

Not only so; I have another reason for addressing the House at this particular time. The gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. SCOTT] is a distinguished member of the Coinage Committee. That Committee has reported a bill the consideration of which will, I have no doubt, consume much of the valuable time of the House. This fact I recognize, that when that bill comes up for discussion the gentleman will have the right of way on this floor as against me and others not members of that committee who entertain opposite convictions upon that subject. Is it to be wondered at then that I, as a member of the War Claims Committee, entitled to this day for the passage of our few little bills for the relief of suffering poor men and poor women, should oppose the consumption of time by a one, two, or three hours' speech in favor of gold in order that the bonds of the country shall be paid in gold?

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Chairman, I think that after these remarks perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] will be willing to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, I have the floor. I do not give my consent to the withdrawal of the amendment, and I do not yield the floor for any purpose. [Laughter.] I propose to vindicate the payment of small claims precisely in the same way that the bonds of this country are to be paid.

Mr. STRUBLE. That is all right, but, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest——

Mr. GEDDES. Well, then, let me alone. [Laughter.] Before I get through I will prove that it is right I do not ask any concession from any man unless I convince his judgment.

Mr. STRUBLE. I do not differ with the gentleman on that question; at least I do not think we shall differ.

Mr. GEDDES. You certainly will not differ with me by the time I get through. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire, however, Mr. Chairman, that business should be considered in the line for which this day is set apart.

Mr. GEDDES. It is directly in the line of business that I am now at work. But I want to state that the only business of this country is not railroading or bondholding. The poor man has some rights that we ought to recognize. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his able report to the present Congress, in reviewing the legislation of Congress under Republican rule, says:

> To many our prosperity might well seem satisfactory, although in fact ever since the war it has been intolerably abridged by an unwise financial policy.

I propose to vindicate the correctness of this assertion and point out some of the evils resulting from it, and by the light of that experience avoid the line of financial policy so prejudicial to our prosperity.

It is susceptible of the clearest proof that the financial policy of the Republican party from 1865 to the last exercise of power has been full of evil, and that continually. Its legislation has been in the highest degree burdensome and oppressive upon the many in the plain, direct interest of the few. The leaders of that party have with unvarying and ceaseless activity, at times openly and at other times secretly, sought to establish and firmly fasten upon the people of this country a moneyed oligarchy. Whether these efforts will prove successful or not must be settled in the near future. The power of the people to protect themselves in the presence and under the various appliances and multiplied influences of concentrated wealth often appears doubtful. Whether they can establish their proper influence in the affairs of this nation is the overshadowing question to be determined. The people have endured patiently and with long suffering an "unwise financial policy" and an unjust, unequal, and burdensome scheme of taxation. As wisely stated by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report:

> Both are legacies of the war. They are unaccountable except by the light of events which afforded their origin and their excuse.

A free people can not be enslaved in a day. The evils imposed have been gradual. The power behind the throne of the Republican party has always been the same. Sometimes it has appeared in disguise, seeking to hide its real purpose, but sooner or later the crushing, grinding influence of its acts disclosed its real character.

Mark some of its footsteps from the year 1865. At the close of our late war the business interests of the country were highly prosperous. Every laborer in the land was in great demand, and his services in every department of employment very remunerative. Every branch of productive capital was active and profitable. In all the workshops and mines, on all the farms and in all the stores the active capital invested and the men employed worked harmoniously together, producing general contentment. No financial depression, no business distress, no fears of impending bankruptcy were seen or felt in all the land.

All this was changed by the policy forced upon the country at the instance and in the interest of that kind of capital owned by the few, non-productive to all except its owners. This capital must not be confounded with capital invested and used in all the various industries of the country.

During the long years since the war a moneyed class has been created by legislation and from time to time encouraged until it has become a fearful moneyed power in the land. It has been gradually eating up the substance that rightfully belonged to labor.

This species of capital has from the beginning been championed by the Republican party. Legislation in its interest produced the most appalling condition of things, disastrous to the best business interests of the country. Bankruptcy the most startling spread throughout the country. Suffering and pauperism everywhere prevailed. In this government of the people a million of men willing and anxious to work were thrown out of employment. The workshops, stores, and mines were closed. Money-lending and bond-holding alone were profitable. In their interest this widespread ruin was wrought.

This greedy and relentless form of wealth demanded special legislation and secured it. It was secured in defiance of the rights of the humble and unprotected laborer. It was obtained regardless of the bankruptcy and ruin thereby entailed upon the useful and productive capital invested in manufacturing, mining, farming, and other industries. All of these higher and better interests were forced to yield to this exacting, overreaching, insatiate money power. Step by step it marched toward the seat of power, on which it now seeks to be permanently enthroned. Its bold, grasping nature has been seen and felt, and the warning sounded; but under different guises it has secured its present hold upon the vitals of this nation. Without any just claims to commend it, by the sheer force of its strength this bond-holding interest has been the dictator of the policy of the Republican party, until it now seeks a lease of permanent power.

It does not share the burdens of government. It builds no schoolhouses, court-houses, orphans' or soldiers' homes, or asylums of any kind for the unfortunate. It erects no cottages as homes for laborers, takes no part in the public improvement of highways or other burdens of government. Productive capital and the toiling masses must unite to maintain schools, improve highways, erect buildings for the unfortunate, and carry on the Government, and allow this favored form of capital to remain idle, reaping where it has not sown. This unconscionable form of capital accepts the benefits and enjoyment of the blessings of government provided by productive capital and labor as it accepts the dews, rain, and sunshine of Heaven, considering them a kind of birthright due from useful capital and industry. How was this brought about? A brief glance at the history and workings of the financial policy and legislation of the Republican party will answer my present purpose.

At the close of the war in 1865 we had a currency circulation of about $1,200,000,000, on which was based all the values of property of every description. Peace opened up immense demand in the South for our currency, which naturally affected the volume of circulation in the North. But notwithstanding the demand and necessity for this circulation, the contrary policy of contracting the circulating medium was commenced and produced its inevitable results, great shrinkage in values, depression in business, and general bankruptcy. From that time the people have been grossly robbed in the interest of this growing, greedy, and overawing money power.

In March, 1869, the Republican party, with entire control of the Government, made the 5-20 bonds payable in coin, when by the contract under which they were issued they were payable in currency except the interest. That act—a single turn of the extortioner's wheel—gave the bondholders $600,000,000 of the people's money. This was done not only in violation of the contract authorizing these bonds, but it was in violation of the platform on which that party secured a new lease of power.

In the year 1868 great fears were entertained by the people that the Republican leaders would yield to the persistent clamors of the bondholding class, and therefore in conventions obtained solemn pledges that so great a wrong should not be done. The Chicago convention of 1868 pledged the Republican party that the bond should be paid as the contract provided. Many State conventions that year felt compelled to give the people the same pledge. Senator SHERMAN, under the influence of the pure atmosphere of his Mansfield home, in 1868 wrote the following letter, which for the period of that campaign gave great encouragement to the people, expressing as it did the general sentiment of the people of both political parties:

> DEAR SIR: I was pleased to receive your letter. My personal interests are the same as yours, but like you I do not intend to be influenced by them. My construction of the law is the result of careful examination, and I feel quite sure an impartial court would affirm it if the case could be tried before a court. I send you my views as fully stated in a speech. Your idea is that we propose to repudiate or violate a promise when we offer to redeem the principal in legal-tenders.
> I think the bondholder violates his promise when he refuses to take the same kind of money he paid for the bonds. If the case is to be tested by law I am right; if it is to be tested by Jay Cooke's advertisement I am wrong. I hate repudiation or anything like it, but we ought not to be deterred from doing what is right by fear of undeserved epithets.
> If under the law as it stands the holders of the five-twenties can only be paid in gold, then we are repudiators if we propose to pay otherwise. If the bondholder can legally demand only the kind of money he paid, then he is a repudiator and extortioner to demand money more valuable than he gave.
> Truly, yours,
> JOHN SHERMAN.

Mr. Chairman, when the new Republican administration entered upon its duties all pledges to the people were repudiated by the act of 1869 to enable the bondholder to become "a repudiator and extortioner" by demanding and receiving money for them contrary to the terms of his contract. Is it possible to conceive of a more bold, destructive, and iniquitous scheme than this piece of legislation? It was bold, because it was in direct violation of the most solemn pledges given the people of the country. It was destructive, because it increased the burdens of productive capital and labor by unjust retroactive legislation. It was iniquitous, because it was giving more than the original contract provided for bonds which only cost the holders 40 cents on the dollar.

What apology was offered to the public for this flagrant violation of the rights of the people? What reason could be assigned for thus increasing the burdens resting upon them? The law of 1869 is entitled "An act to sustain the national credit." Here we have a just and honest motive—a pure, patriotic sentiment—held up to the gaze of an honest people to mislead and deceive them. Is it possible that what Senator Sherman stigmatized as repudiation and extortion could so soon become essential to the national credit?

When Moses, the leader of God's chosen people through the wilderness, held up the rod that all who looked upon it might be healed of the serpent's bite and live none looked in vain, but all who trusted and looked were saved. But the Republican leaders by this title holding it up for us to look at simply sought to deceive, mislead, and mock the burdened, suffering people. The bite of the fiery serpent continued and increased. If any individual should be overwhelmed with debt, but still hoping and struggling to pay it, and should by a new contract swell his indebtedness in that way, his family and friends would not believe it was done to "sustain" his credit. Nor can a political party in that way long deceive a free, intelligent people.

On the 14th day of July, 1870, another act was passed "to authorize the refunding of the national debt," in which the pledge of the United States to pay the debt in coin was renewed. It was provided in that act that the bonds issued under its provisions should be redeemable in coin of the standard value of July 14, 1870, which would be in gold dollars consisting of 25.8 grains of standard gold or in silver dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver. The present gold and silver coin of the country are both of the standard value prescribed by that law. This generous act of the Government in making the bonds, originally payable in greenbacks, the same currency paid the soldier for his services, payable in coin should have been considered a full compensation for the patriotism manifested in buying the bonds for from 40 to 50 cents on the dollar in coin.

To this point in the struggle the bondholder fought, openly insisting that it was generally understood that the bonds of the United States should be redeemed in coin, and that the agents of the Government had so represented in offering them for sale. As soon as their claim was submitted to by Republican legislation it operated to stimulate the bondholder's love of gain, so that he at once conceived it possible to convert this new contract for payment in coin into a contract for gold alone. How is this new scheme to be accomplished? They could not hope to again successfully appeal to the patriotism of the people. Silver was known to be a popular coin with the people. It has existed as a coin from the earliest dawn of civilization, and in our own country was recognized in the Constitution by the founders of the Government. From 1794 no change had been made in the amount of pure silver constituting the standard silver dollar. It was for about forty years of our history immediately prior to 1873 at a premium from 1 to 5 per cent. above gold.

Mr. Chairman, it is now a matter of history that by an unaccountable inadvertence or clandestine act the law of 1873 operated to demonetize silver. Congress created a commission to revise the statutes, providing for a codification and rearrangement of existing laws without any authority to devise new legislation. The laws thus revised make a large volume, which in 1874 was adopted by Congress without reading on the assurance of the commissioners that no new legislation had been introduced.

It was not generally known until 1876 that the section demonetizing silver had been introduced. The section is in the following words:

> The silver coin of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

On the 14th of April, 1874, it certainly could not have been known by the then members of this House that the silver dollar was not a legal coin, for on that day Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts, offered the following resolution, which was voted upon:

> That from and after the 1st day of September, 1874, nothing but gold and silver coin of the United States shall be a legal tender in the payment of any debt thereafter contracted.

This action of this House at that date recognized silver as possessing by law the full legal-tender quality, and no voice was raised or hint given that silver had been demonetized. Thus we find that the representatives of the people, watchfully guarding their interests, had no knowledge or suspicion that legal-tender silver coins could no longer be struck at the mints.

President Grant had no knowledge or suspicion that silver had been demonetized as late as January 14, 1875. In his message to Congress of that date announcing his approval of the resumption act he uses the following language:

> With the present facilities for coinage it would take a period probably beyond that fixed by law for final specie resumption to coin the silver necessary to transact the business of the country.

Thereupon the President recommended the establishment of one or more new mints at either Chicago, Omaha, or Saint Louis.

As late as the 30th of March, 1876, the subject of the currency was under discussion in the Senate, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date shows that it was not then known by the most vigilant men of that body. The following from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date proves it:

> Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him or some other Senator a question? Is it true that there is now by law no American dollar; and, if so, is it true that the effect of this bill is to be to make half-dollars and quarter-dollars the only silver coin which can be used as a legal tender?
> Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer the Senator from New York that since the law of 1853 the use of the silver whole dollar has been discontinued and none has been issued. That has been so since 1853.
> Mr. CONKLING. Is there power to issue it?
> Mr. SHERMAN. There is no power and has been none.
> Mr. BOGY. The power to issue existed from 1853 to 1873, but since there has been no power.
> Mr. SHERMAN. There has been no silver dollar issued since 1853, and my impression is that the law of 1853 did not confer the power, but the law of 1873 cut off the power, in my judgment, if it existed.
> Mr. JONES, of Nevada. The law of 1853 authorized the coinage of the silver dollar, and it was never demonetized until 1873, but it needed no law to prevent people from coining such a dollar for use in business when there was another dollar to be got 3 or 4 per cent. cheaper. The people did in 1853, and up to 1873, have an option that if gold should become dearer they could fall back on the silver dollar. In 1873 that privilege was taken away.

Mr. Chairman, having quoted this discussion in the Senate precisely as it occurred, it is due to Senator SHERMAN to say that he subsequently acknowledged the error under which he labored. In his biography, on page 209, I find this statement by the author:

> Mr. SHERMAN acknowledges an error he made in saying the dollar had not been issued since 1853. Official reports show that large quantities were issued from 1870 to 1873, when it was demonetized.

The five years following this legislation proved the most disastrous to business and labor ever known in this country. The shrinkage in values, the general depression in business of all kinds, and the widespread bankruptcy that followed alarmed and affected every community. The working classes suffered severely. Their condition excited general sympathy, but they were not the only sufferers. The manufacturer and all who had money invested in business shared in the losses and suffering. Reliable statistics show that during that period of five years shrinkage in values occurred causing failures aggregating over $100,000,000.

This was the natural and inevitable result of the financial policy of the times. Manufacturing and other business enterprises had been commenced on a different basis. It is impossible to strike down one-half the circulating medium of the country without producing disastrous results.

By the legislation of 1873 the American dollar was driven out of existence and the purpose and policy announced to the commercial world that the silver dollar should no longer be received in payment of bonds or constitute any part of the legal-tender currency of the United States. It placed us before the civilized world precisely where we would be by the unconditional suspension of silver coinage now. It is now urged that to suspend it now would produce a business millennium. Did it then? Let the gloomy years of dullness and stagnation in business of all kinds that continued until the restoration of silver coinage in 1878 answer the question.

It is true Republican leaders try to hide the evil influences of their class legislation by referring to the wonderful increase in the aggregate wealth of the country, and it is claimed that $30,000,000,000 have been added during the last twenty years. The fallacy of such an argument is manifest. This increase in wealth would be a great blessing if it was found distributed among the masses in some proportion to their industry and frugality, but the exact reverse is true. It is found concentrated in the hands of the few in whose interest legislation has been secured.

The immense advantages afforded the laboring classes in this country by the soil, climate, and variety of employment have to some extent neutralized the evil effects of injurious legislation. This is no apology for the wrong done. The privileges and blessings enjoyed have been in defiance of vicious legislation. A wise thinker on political economy a hundred years ago expressed the principle found in our national legislation and its practical effect as follows:

> The natural effort of every individual to better his own condition when suffered to exert itself with freedom and security is so powerful a principle that it is alone and without any assistance not only capable of carrying on society to wealth and prosperity, but of surmounting a hundred impertinent obstructions with which the folly of human laws too often encumber its operations.
> Like the unknown principle of animal life it frequently restores health and vigor to the constitution in spite not only of the disease but of the absurd prescription of the doctor.—Wealth of Nations, book ii, page 141.

Mr. Chairman, the five years of financial suffering mentioned aroused the people of the country to demand the legislation of 1878, requiring the coinage of silver dollars not less than two nor more than four millions per month.

Was this demand of the people wise? It was conceded that the immediate effect was to aid the resumption of specie payment which followed in 1879.

In referring to this legislation restoring the silver dollar Hon. W. M. EVARTS, former Secretary of State and now a Senator from New York, at the international monetary conference, said:

> I say the United States came to the conclusion that as there never had been a time in history when both silver and gold had not been necessary and been used as money; as there had never been a time in history when their united strength was more than adequate for the unfolding progress of society, so above all things at this age and in the actual circumstances of the world was this true.

Senator SHERMAN, in a speech made in 1876 on the subject of the legal tender of silver coin, said:

The utter ruin that would come to mankind, especially to the poorer nations by the demonetization of silver, can not be estimated by us. Take one-half of the solid money of the world out of existence, take the sole standard of more than two-thirds of the human race, reduce it to a base metal and the effect upon the commerce of the world would be incalculable. It can not be done; it will not be done. There is no danger of it.

These two metals have traveled side by side from the beginning of time. The records of human history do not go back to a time where they did not move together. They have varied in value, sometimes one and sometimes the other being higher; but they have gone on, gold the money of the rich, silver the money of the poor; the one to measure acquired wealth, the other to measure the daily necessities of life; and, sir, no act of Parliament, although it may disturb for a moment the relation of these two metals to each other, nothing but the act of God can destroy the use of both of them by mankind.

The most distinguished economists and financiers of Europe and America favor the adoption and maintenance of the bimetallic monetary system. Baron de Rothschild, of Paris, used on a recent occasion the following language:

The two legal moneys, gold and silver, ought to be maintained. The two metals constitute together the monetary circulation of the world. They were united by a tie of a certain degree of elasticity, but which was indissoluble. To separate them would be impossible under pain of falling into a commercial chaos of which the consequences would be incalculable. The more there was of the precious metals gold and silver the better, for the more labor was developed.

Ex-Senator Thurman, of Ohio, as a member of the commission, before the international convention said:

I believe that bimetallism will ultimately prevail, for I can not see how the vast structure of credit, the most distinguishing feature of modern industry and commerce, can be supported on a gold basis alone; with both metals its base has often been found too narrow, but with one it would be positively unsafe.

What was the practical effect of the act of 1878 requiring the coinage of silver as stated? Had that legislation the tendency or effect to drive gold from the country? Did it have the effect to flood this country with silver from abroad to the exclusion of gold? On the contrary; soon after the passage of the act of 1878 the business interests of the country revived, the demand for labor and the price of wages increased. Manufacturing and mining companies furnished remunerative employment for workmen, and the farmers of the country found a market for all their products.

Gold, instead of leaving us, flowed more abundantly into the country. The Comptroller of the Currency in his report for 1881 gives us the facts that from the date of the restoration of silver in 1878 to November 1, 1881, the imports of gold exceeded the exports of gold $197,000,000. I put the statement in this form to show the feeling in the commercial world immediately following the popular demand for the restoration of silver.

Next let us look at the entire period from 1878 to 1885, inclusive, and we find statistics furnished by the Director of the Mint show that during the period we imported $301,025,100 in gold and exported $113,744,843 in gold, making our importation of gold during that period $187,280,257 more than we exported from the country. If we look to the last fiscal year separately we find we imported $26,691,696 in gold and exported $8,477,843 in gold, making $18,213,853 more in gold flowing into the country than went out.

Concurrently with this historical conduct of the business men of the world in relation to gold, how do they regard silver? During the same period we exported $172,145,209 in silver and imported $103,914,843 in silver, making $31,769,745 exported in silver more than we imported. Looking at the last fiscal year separately to see whether any change has occurred to alarm or discourage us we find $16,550,953 in silver imported and $33,753,633 in silver exported, making $17,202,680 of silver exported in excess of the amount flowing into our country.

If human experience is worth anything we must consider it settled that the coinage of the standard silver dollars, as at present limited, has not driven gold from the country or flooded us with an excess of silver.

A persistent, and in some cases unfair, effort has been made to prejudice the people against the coinage of silver. The amount of silver in the Treasury compared with the amount in circulation has been grossly exaggerated. The proceedings of the American Bankers' Association will be found to illustrate the kind of efforts made to forestall and mislead public sentiment in regard to silver. The last convention, which was held in Chicago September last, published quite a volume of essays, and in the one on page 53 will be found this statement:

With two hundred millions of these fiat dollars in the Treasury being transported from place to place for want of room, and another one hundred million for which silver certificates of deposit are floating about the country, it must be evident the people have no use for it in such unreasonable, inconvenient, and unprofitable proportion.

Mr. Chairman, this statement is remarkable in view of facts and figures within the reach of all. The monthly statements from the Treasury furnish information showing that at the time this essay was delivered the standard silver dollars and bullion in the Treasury amounted to only seventy-six million beyond what was needed to redeem the certificates, and the report of the Treasurer for December 31, 1885, shows $76,335,765.84 silver in the Treasury in excess of that held for certificates.

There is another significant fact bearing upon the question of the effect of the restoration of silver in 1878 showing that business men and holders of gold did not fear the present limited coinage of silver. Between September 18, 1880, and January, 1885, an order of the Treasury Department authorized the exchange of silver certificates for gold coin or gold bullion deposited with the Government. This right was withdrawn and all further exchange prohibited since January last. During the time such exchange was permitted the amount of gold that flowed into the Treasury in exchange for silver certificates is stated in the last report of the Treasurer, on page 24, as follows:

The issue of silver certificates by Treasury officers in the South and West for gold coin deposited with the assistant treasurer in New York under departmental circular of September 18, 1880, was discontinued in January last. The amount which has been issued in this manner to the date named was $80,730,500.

What rational financial objection can be urged against the continuance of this privilege granted the people of exchanging gold for silver to the extent of all the silver coined under the act of 1878?

Mr. Chairman, I regard this as a struggle between the debtor and creditor classes. Speedy and inevitable financial ruin would result from limiting the quantity of legal money and confining it to gold. It would almost double the amount of the debts of the country. Mortgages given and debts contracted under the present coinage laws would, after the adoption of the single gold-currency policy, be so largely increased as to produce widespread distress. Stability and safety in our currency are indispensable to our prosperity. Values fixed upon one basis, and then suddenly unsettling those values, must produce unjust and disastrous results. The financial prospects and happiness of the debtor class should not be thus assailed by our legislation.

We have about $250,000,000 of silver and $550,000,000 of gold in this country. Is it possible that our silver is an enemy to our growth, prosperity, and greatness? Is it an alarming inflation of the currency of the country? I find these questions triumphantly answered by the condition of our country in 1866, and a fact in regard to it by Senator SHERMAN in the United States Senate on April 6, 1866, as follows:

Here is a significant fact that when gold was 280 our currency was $550,000,000, and now when our currency is over $700,000,000 gold is 130, and is going down and down, and no power in this world can prevent its going down.

Mr. Chairman, this fact proves that the value of gold fell from 280 to 130 under the influence of an increase in the currency to about the difference in amount between our gold and silver circulation now. It is now proposed to reverse that order of things.

Mr. Chairman, if the national, State, municipal, individual, and every form of indebtedness must be paid in gold, its enhanced value and purchasing power would make it a hard money indeed; hard to be obtained, hard upon the producing and laboring classes, and falling with crushing weight upon all except the moneyed class.

This favored class would have their wealth greatly increased at the expense and suffering of the producing and laboring classes. In proportion to the increase in the value of money the wages of labor would be decreased. The bonds of the Government payable in 1892 and 1907, instead of being as at present at a premium of 12 and 24 per cent. respectively, would advance to double that premium.

The national debt in 1865 amounted to $2,756,000,000. It now amounts to $1,843,713,715.80. Although in the twenty years we have reduced the principal to the present amount and have paid $1,900,000,000 in interest on the debt, the balance is still as large and as hard to be paid, if we estimate it by the chief products of human labor in our country. It should not be still further increased as a burden upon the people.

The Democratic party, after a struggle of twenty years, not only elected but inaugurated a President. He holds the reins of Government in the interests of the people. The vicious financial policy of the Republican leaders, the reckless extravagance in every department of the Government, and the heavy burdens imposed upon the people by an unjust, unequal, and iniquitous tariff law secured the popular verdict in favor of reform in all of them.

Our pledges must be kept inviolate. The cardinal and time-honored principles of the party—dear to the fathers in the earlier days of the Republic—must be adhered to with unfaltering firmness. Then our land will be filled with peace and safety, honesty and happiness, with such unequaled privileges, social, political, secular, and religious, as no other people ever enjoyed.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, why can not we go on with the private bills?

Mr. GEDDES. I am on private bills.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It seems to me the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] is guilty of the inconsistency which he charges upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Why should he take up time in this discussion when almost all of us, I think, are decidedly dissatisfied that private bill day should be consumed in this way?

Mr. GEDDES. I suppose you are, for you have only heard the gold side.

Mr. REED, of Maine. "The gold side!" I am as much dissatisfied with the time being taken up on that side as the other; and I say the example of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in this respect ought not to be imitated.

Mr. GEDDES. Why did you not make your objection earlier?

Mr. REED, of Maine. I did.

Mr. GEDDES. Oh, you did! Then you did not get it in very well.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Pretty well, I thought.

Mr. GEDDES. No doubt you did the best you could; but you were overruled.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I was.

Mr. GEDDES. And are likely to be overruled again.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I suspect I am likely to be; but I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentleman from Ohio, while claiming to object to the introduction of this question by the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, I hope this does not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. GEDDES. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. GEDDES resumed his remarks but was interrupted by

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, who said: Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania offered a proposition and then spoke against it; and now the gentleman from Ohio is following in the same line—making a speech against the proposition. I insist that some member in favor of the amendment should take the floor. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. GEDDES proceeded with his remarks for some time, when

Mr. REED, of Maine, said: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. My point is that the gentleman from Ohio is not addressing himself to the amendment before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GEDDES. Well, I am doing the best I can.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I have no doubt he is. I agree with the gentleman about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. GEDDES. I presume I am not doing quite so well in your estimation as the gentleman who just preceded me.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I did not do him the honor to listen to him, so I do not know whether the gentleman from Ohio is doing better or worse.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Does the Chair hold that it is in order to consume the time of the House in this way?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

Mr. GEDDES. Well, we shall see whether gentlemen can get silver off the floor when they did not get gold off. That is the question now. There may be some point enforced in favor of getting silver off the floor that we could not discover as against gold.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, in the proposition I make I have no reference to the views which the gentleman from Ohio may possibly be presenting to this House. I have not listened to him nor did I listen to the views of the gentleman who preceded him. But I do feel—in common, I think, with the majority of the members of this House—that the use of this day for the purpose of general debate as if we were in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is not exactly in accordance with our rules; and I desire to ascertain from the ruling of the Chair whether such is the fact. If this proceeding be in accordance with the rules, I have nothing more to say; the gentleman from Ohio will then proceed in his right, and other gentlemen will do the same; but I think there ought first to be an adjudication from the Chair that such proceeding is suitable and proper. If it is, none of us have any right to complain. If it is not, the gentleman from Ohio will have no right to complain. I make the point of order, not in any invidious spirit toward him or any of the propositions which he is advancing or thinks he is advancing.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I agree with the gentleman from Maine in his general view; but inasmuch as there has been a speech made on one side of this question, I submit that my colleague [Mr. GEDDES] ought to be permitted to make his speech in reply.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But, Mr. Chairman, we have had no end of speeches on what I assume to be "the other side," from information we have had by remarks made here, not from anything that I have heard to-day. We have had no end of speeches upon both sides; but I think that the majority have been on the side that is being supported by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GEDDES. By way of apology, I will ask whether the gentleman from Maine heard my statement that the speech of the gentleman who preceded me was made by a member of the Coinage Committee, which committee will have the right of way on the floor when its bill comes up, so that I would not be able to get the floor on this subject as against him. He now comes in and tries to consume our private bill day by devoting it to a discussion of the gold question.

Mr. REED, of Maine. And you, in order to rectify the evil, propose to take another hour away from private bills in order to discuss silver coinage.

Mr. GEDDES. I will take care of private bills, and the House will be satisfied with my action.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

When any member desires to speak or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise and respectfully address himself to "Mr. Speaker," and on being recognized may address the House from any place on the floor or from the Clerk's desk, and shall confine himself to the question under debate, avoiding personality.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I submit to the gentleman from Ohio that to an amendment to pay a particular thing in silver the remarks he is now making are not in order.

Mr. GEDDES. Yes, they are strictly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that when the bill under consideration was read the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose and addressed the Chair and asked for recognition. No gentleman of the War Claims Committee and no other gentleman addressed the Chair at the time. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he first read and then sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment to the bill under consideration. The Clerk will report that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill, after the word "cents," in line 7, by inserting the words "in standard silver dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. After the gentleman from Pennsylvania had been recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] asked the Chair a question as to what was under discussion. The Chair will have the notes of that portion of to-day's proceedings read.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I will say, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the interruption I made, that coming into the Hall without knowing what was going on, I inquired what it was. I was not aware of the condition of affairs when I made the request.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read what occurred during the course of the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] when the question was raised.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DUNHAM. What is the business before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] sent up an amendment to the pending bill, as the Chairman understands, and is speaking to his amendment.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Has the amendment been read?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Does it refer to the silver question?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk again read the amendment as above printed.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Ah! I see it is entirely pertinent. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state these proceedings occurred during the hour occupied by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. No point of order was raised by any member of the committee. After his hour expired the Chair recognized the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES], the chairman of the Committee on War Claims.

The gentleman from Maine now submits the point of order that the gentleman from Ohio is not confining himself to the subject under consideration. So far as the gentleman has proceeded the Chair will state that a part of his remarks are certainly pertinent to the question under consideration. The gentleman in his opening remarks referred to the pending bill and stated his reasons for opposing the amendment. Subsequently the Chair thinks that the gentleman has not been strictly within the rule. The Chair can only state, as has been stated by occupants of the chair repeatedly before, that he hopes in the time allotted to the gentleman he will confine himself to the rules of the House.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Permit me one word.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it not in order to move that the committee rise?

Mr. GEDDES. This discussion is not, of course, to come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not. It is not in order to move that the committee rise, as the gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And he can not be taken off the floor for any such purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. No; not without his consent.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I desire to state to the House, because I think it only fair to myself I should do so, that the observation I made in regard to the pertinency of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the subject under discussion was made without having heard what his remarks were, except they seemed to be on the silver question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And the gold standard.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Not at all. I did not recognize him personally, and it was fifteen minutes after that before I had any information of the side upon which he was. I think it fair to state that to the House. I am not trying to make fish of one and flesh of the other, but I did sympathize fully with the opening remarks of the gentleman from Ohio about taking up the time of the House in such discussion. I really hope, and beg leave to express that hope, he may continue in that vein.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, no one can more earnestly desire than I do that all discussion here shall be in accord with the letter and spirit of the rules and relate to the subject at the time actually under consideration. This discussion of silver out of place began on a bill on another subject, of which I had charge. Whether appropriate or not, it began on an amendment technically in order, and on this side of the House. Next followed the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] in a speech alike irrelevant, but greatly to the gratification of our friends now complaining on the other side of the House. That speech was no more in order than the other. It was followed by another, and still another, and to-day the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], acting as the other gentlemen had done, offered an amendment, which is just as much in order to a private as it would be if offered to a public bill. He then took the floor in his own right on his amendment, being at least technically in order under the rules of the House, and his speech was to the amendment he had offered, and was justified by what had gone before.

While I deprecate this character of discussion, I know of no method under the rules to prevent it; and unless gentlemen will themselves, under what I believe to be the spirit of the rules, confine their discussions strictly to the subject-matter under consideration, I suppose this character of debate will go further.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, just one word. The discussion to which the gentleman from Illinois calls our attention was a discussion which took place in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where, as I understand, greater latitude of debate has always been allowed. In that committee it has always been allowable, at the discretion of the member occupying the floor, to discuss any subject relating to the state of the Union without question. But this is a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, which, as I understand it, is quite a different committee from that to which I have referred.

Mr. MORRISON. Both are alike irrelevant and opposed to the spirit of the rule which requires members to speak to the subject-matter under consideration. The silver-coinage discussion in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in the past few weeks as well as in this committee to-day has all been on or to amendments proposing to pay particular allowances in silver. The amendments were, of course, offered for the sole purpose of taking advantage of the rule and thus enable gentlemen to make speeches upon this particular subject. Such amendments are in order to the same extent on private or public bills in Committee of the Whole or out of it. Both are against the spirit of the rule. I very much desire that the House will come to so consider it and that the practice will go into disuse.

Mr. BLAND. Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to make one or two suggestions in this connection.

I suppose that inasmuch as this discussion has begun we will save time by allowing the gentleman from Ohio to conclude his speech; but I do hope that this House will have some respect for the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, inasmuch as the gentlemen composing that committee up to this day have refrained from participating in the debate upon this subject.

There was no understanding that any member of the committee, nor was there any expectation that any one of the members of the committee, would speak upon this question until the subject was before the House regularly in a measure to be presented by that committee; and inasmuch as this subject, as is apparent to everybody present, will be discussed from time to time in this irregular way, I desire when the committee rises to-day to ask instructions of the House to set aside a day for the consideration of a bill which will be reported by that committee, so that the House can discuss it until it thinks it has exhausted the subject. We can go on then with the other business which needs attention without the interjection of an irrelevant subject, and until that is done the House must see that nothing else can be done.

Mr. GEDDES. I desire, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman——

Mr. MORRISON. Permit me a moment.

Mr. GEDDES. Certainly.

Mr. MORRISON. If the gentleman from Missouri infers from anything I have said that the discussion is to go on as it has heretofore been going on and without objection, he misunderstood me. It will not proceed in this irregular way without objection. Of course there should be no objection to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] continuing his speech.

Mr. BLAND. No, I did not mean that. What I meant was that the gentleman from Illinois nor any other gentleman on the floor can control this subject. It can only be controlled by the House itself setting a day for the consideration of a bill reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, so as to permit, in its proper place and in a proper way, the discussion of this whole question.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, I want to put myself on record as being in earnest sympathy with gentlemen who had been endeavoring to take me off the floor. [Laughter.] They observed (as I understood the earnest sympathy of my good friend from Maine at the opening of my remarks to mean) that the time of the committee which reports these private claims was being taken up by members of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and noticing that, I intended to make the issue and to emphasize it as strongly as I could, whether when private bill day is taken from us it must always be for gold. That is my attitude, and I will, as far as within my power, adhere to the point.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow a question?

Mr. GEDDES. I can not yield now.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I am a member of the Committee on War Claims——

Mr. GEDDES. If in what I say I do not make the matter about which you desire information perfectly clear, then I will cheerfully yield to the gentleman for any question he may wish to ask.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Just one question: Whether you wrote that speech after the remarks about gold had been made or before? [Laughter].

Mr. GEDDES. Oh, sir, I did it before. [Laughter.] That gold speech was not written to-day, since this question came up, I can tell the gentleman. It was read from manuscript, as I shall read the most of mine. Let us be fair to each other.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, and Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, objected.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I move as an amendment to the amendment what I send to the desk.

Mr. SCOTT. Is not my amendment withdrawn?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection was made.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand I have the right to withdraw it. I stated that I withdrew it. I then understood some gentleman objected and that the Chair decided I could not withdraw the amendment because objection was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to ask unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I did withdraw it. I did not ask any unanimous consent; I had a right to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state he misapprehended the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Chair asked consent for the withdrawal of the amendment, because he was under the impression that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had asked it. There having been no vote on the amendment, the gentleman has the right to withdraw it.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] to offer an amendment. The amendment will be read.

Insert the following words: "Or in such lawful money as William H. Wheeler may demand."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that can not be offered as an amendment to the amendment which has been withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I will offer my amendment then as an amendment to the bill. I do not want to take up the time of the committee now in discussing these questions. I believe the days set apart for private legislation should be devoted to that purpose. And as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] has attempted a defense of the administration, and as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] has shown to this House and the country, so far as his speech may be read, that the Democratic party, as led by the Secretary of the Treasury, is not to be trusted, I do not think they require an answer from our side. If one has bolstered up the administration the other has assailed it.

Since the gentleman from Ohio has sought to cast reflections on the Republican party on account of the debt that is piled up, I will say to him if he and his party had been as anxious to keep down the debt as the Republican party was, and had stood by the Government as the Republican party did, this debt would not have been piled mountain high to be paid in gold or greenbacks.

Now I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken on Mr. HAMMOND'S motion, there were—ayes 29, noes 54.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HALSELL. I ask that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to have the report on the bill read.

The report (by Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 822) for the relief of William H. Wheeler, have examined the same, and submit the following report:

This claim is for corn and fodder taken by the Union Army from the claimant, at or near Bowling Green, Ky., in the year 1862.

The claim was duly presented to the Quartermaster-General for settlement, and was referred by the Quartermaster-General to an agent for investigation and report. On Novembr 22, 1881, the agent submitted a report recommending that claimant be paid the sum of $633.50. General James A. Ekin, deputy quartermaster-general, United States Army, indorsed the agent's report as follows:

"The proof supplied appears to be of a reliable nature, and the claim, to a certain extent, is no doubt meritorious. The estimate made by the investigating agent of corn and fodder taken in this instance, as a result of his investigation, is considered reasonable and just—placing its valuation at $633.50 unpaid for—and which sum he recommends be allowed claimant in full of claim. I concur in the agent's recommendation. Claimant was loyal."

The case was considered September 9, 1882, and no allowance recommended by the Quartermaster-General.

The loyalty of the claimant and the taking of the property and its value are proven to the satisfaction of the committee; and they report back the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the friends of this bill whether this claim was not rejected by the Quartermaster-General, and if not rejected how it happens to come here for allowance?

Mr. HALSELL. It was rejected by the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. SPRINGER. On what ground? The report does not disclose that.

Mr. HALSELL. It was rejected on the ground that the Quartermaster-General was not satisfied as to the loyalty of the claimant, and now this report shows there is not any question about it at all. I will say I have gone through the papers, every solitary one of them, myself. And I know this old gentleman; he lives in my town, and I have known him all my life. There is not a scintilla of proof to the contrary of his loyalty, but on the other hand there is an abundance of affirmative proof by his neighbors that he is a man of as good loyalty as any man in Kentucky. The bill is all right.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WOLFORD. I move that the committee rise, so that action may be taken on the bills which have been reported and are before the House, before we forget all about them.

The question being taken on Mr. WOLFORD's motion, there were—ayes 44, noes 58.

So the motion was not agreed to.

JOHN A. COAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4412) for the relief of John A. Coan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to John A. Coan, of Lewis County, Kentucky, the sum of $350, in full compensation for two horses, saddles, and bridles taken from him by the United States forces in Louisiana.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. KLEINER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John A. Coan, report as follows:

That this is a claim for two horses, saddles, and bridles taken from the claimant by the Army of the United States in Louisiana during the late war. Claim stated at $350.

It appears from the proof submitted that the claimant filed his claim with the Quartermaster-General, and that officer submitted a report thereon, which is as follows:

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., August 4, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to forward with report the claim of John A. Coan, Cincinnati, Ohio, late Government lessee of lands in Louisiana, for horses and bridles ($368) taken at Natchez, Miss., in July 1864, by order of General M. Brayman, commanding at that post.

There seems to be evidence of the seizure and impressment of the horses, and that claimant was a lessee of plantations under the policy adopted by the Government, and therefore entitled to be protected.

It is an irregular claim, in that no officer of the Quartermaster's Department appears to have reported, accounted for, or receipted for the property, and one to which the act of July 4, 1864, does not apply, the transaction having occurred in a rebel district.

I am of opinion that the position of claimant as a lessee seems to require the Government to extend to him indemnity in this matter, as is customary in cases where horses are taken from soldiers, officers, or persons employed by the Government in connection with military operations, and respectfully submit the case to the honorable Secretary for his decision whether it shall be made an exceptional case and referred to the Auditor with recommendation for settlement.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

The case was referred by the War Department to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, and that officer decided that the accounting officers could not pay the claim, being prohibited by the act of March 3, 1871.

Your committee think the claim is fully substantiated by the evidence, and that the amount charged is a fair price; they therefore report herewith a bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. KLEINER. As is recited in the report of the Committee on War Claims, the only reason given by the Quartermaster-General for refusing payment was that this claim originated in an insurrectionary district or a State lately in rebellion; but there is abundant proof that Mr. Coan was a loyal man. There is abundant proof too that he was a citizen of Cincinnati at the time he went to Mississippi in the latter part of 1863, and in accordance with the rules that obtained at that time leased from the Government through the regularly authorized Government agents certain plantations, seven in number.

On account of the difficulties surrounding him and the dangers from confederate forces and guerrillas in the vicinity in which these plantations were located he was compelled to keep his stores, his horses and mules, in fact everything except the manual labor employed on the plantations, in the city of Natchez under the surveillance of the United States forces. In 1864 General Brayman had command of that portion of the State of Mississippi. He found himself surrounded by guerrillas and confederate cavalry, and having nothing with which to defend himself and his post save infantry, he ordered the adjutant-general, Major Townsend, to go out and seize horses, mules, or any kind of animal upon which he could mount a certain portion of his command. In obeying this order, the adjutant-general, who was stationed in Natchez, went to the livery stables and seized the horses and other property represented in this claim. There is no dispute as to the seizure, no dispute as to the price, no dispute as to the loyalty of the claimant, and the only reason why he has not received his pay before this or did not receive it at the time, as stated by General Brayman himself, and stated later by General Grant when he was commander of all the armies of the United States, was that the seizure was made in an insurrectionary district, and therefore could not be paid for under the existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does my friend [Mr. KLEINER] understand from the evidence that this property went to the use of the Government?

Mr. KLEINER. Yes, sir; and it was absolutely necessary for the use of the Government at the time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then of course the bill is proper and ought to pass.

Mr. KLEINER. No question at all was raised about the seizure or about the value of the property. The only objection made to the claim was that the property was seized in an insurrectionary district, and that, therefore, there was no provision of law under which it could be paid.

Mr. BEACH. Can the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KLEINER] inform us when this claimant first presented his claim?

Mr. KLEINER. He presented it immediately.

Mr. BEACH. In what year?

Mr. KLEINER. In 1864. The property was seized in July, 1864, and he immediately presented his claim, and has been diligently seeking its payment ever since. He never got a voucher for it, nor did anybody else get a voucher at that time in such a case.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I was about to ask the gentleman whether this party ever got any voucher from the quartermaster for this property.

Mr. KLEINER. He never did.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Why?

Mr. KLEINER. I will state to the committee that there is an affidavit, or certificate, of General Brayman, who ordered this seizure, in which he states that immediately after the seizure was made and when the cavalry had gone out into the country, he was relieved from command there before he could order vouchers to be given or payments made, and was sent away and never returned to that post again.

There is also in the case a statement from General Grant. His letter is furnished to the committee by the War Department. He there states that there were no questions raised as to the seizure of this property, or as to its value, and that the reason no vouchers were given for this or any of the seizures made at that time was that the officer then in charge at the post was almost immediately removed. General Grant states further that the seizure was a military necessity.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I take it that there were many other seizeures made in the same way under the same order and by the same commander at that time, were there not?

Mr. KLEINER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Do you know what has become of those claims?

Mr. KLEINER. I do not. This is the only claim under consideration at this time. We have not yet reached the others.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] seemed to assume a while ago that if these horses were used for the purposes of the Government, then this claim was necessarily good. On that theory any seizure of property for Government use would serve as the basis of a good claim.

Mr. HOLMAN. No. My friend misapprehends my position. It is clear on the face of the report in this case that the property was taken for the use of the Government, and if the seizure had been made in a loyal State, and the property had been so taken and applied to Government use, it would have been a case for adjustment under the 4th of July act.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then the claim rests upon two things.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon three.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Upon three, but chiefly upon two things: First, that this property was seized and appropriated for the use of the Government; and second, that the property was owned by a man who was loyal.

Mr. KLEINER. Yes; he was a loyal man. He was a citizen of Ohio, and was in fact at that time a lessee and agent of the Government. No question has been made as to his loyalty.

Mr. PERKINS. Did the Quartermaster's Department in its investigation ascertain the value of this property?

Mr. KLEINER. Yes, sir; the Quartermaster's Department investigated the matter and it recommended an allowance of $350, but it did not authorize the payment of the claim for the reason I have stated.

Mr. PERKINS. But the Quartermaster's Department found that the property was of that value?

Mr. KLEINER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Clearly such a claim could not be paid under the law as it stood at that time.

Mr. KLEINER. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

D. E. DOWNING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 832) for the relief of D. E. Downing.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay D. E. Downing, of Monroe County, Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $130.50, in payment of that amount for quartermaster's vouchers for quartermaster's stores furnished in 1862 for the use of the United States Army, which amount has never been paid.

Mr. PERRY. I ask that the report in this case, which briefly states the facts, be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think it necessary for us to consume time in the reading of the report on a bill that allows only $130. The time which would be consumed in the reading of the report is of more value than the amount proposed to be appropriated. As a committee of this House has recommended the passage of this bill, and as the amount is so small that it would be within the ordinary jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, I think we may as well accept the finding of the committee and pass the bill without consuming further time.

Mr. PERRY. I move, then, that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. STORM. Let us hear the report. The amount is small, but the principle involved may be large.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not think the whole report need be read. The bill proposes simply to pay this man the amount of three quartermaster's vouchers which were intrusted to a member of Congress and lost. That is all there is of it.

Mr. STORM. Then the member ought to pay the amount.

The report (by Mr. PERRY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 832) for the relief of D. E. Downing, have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on War Claims No. 2443, second session Forty-eighth Congress, and are in substance as follows:

The bill under consideration asks an appropriation of $130.50 for quartermaster's stores and commissary supplies alleged to have been furnished the Army of the United States during the late war. The affidavit of the claimant states:

"That he was a resident of Monroe County, Kentucky, in the year 1862 or 1863; that he was the owner of three United States quartermaster's vouchers, one for $87.50, to be accounted for in the June report of 1862, and one for 400 pounds of beef, valued at 7 cents per pound, making $28, and to be accounted for in the June report of 1862, and also one voucher for 15 bushels of corn, valued at $1 per bushel, making $15, to be accounted for in June report, 1863; that he took the vouchers to Louisville, Ky., and presented them to the quartermaster's department for payment; that the quartermaster at Louisville examined them and said that they were correctly made out, but that he had no money to pay them; that the said vouchers were given to Hon. C. W. Milliken some time in August, 1874, for presentation to the Quartermaster-General for payment; that Hon. C. W. Milliken lost or mislaid the said vouchers; and that for said vouchers he has received no compensation whatever."

This petition is accompanied by an affidavit from Hon. C. W. Milliken that the said vouchers were delivered to him and that he lost or misplaced them.

Your committee, in view of the foregoing statement of facts, report back the bill and recommend its passage.

The question being taken on the motion that the bill be laid aside to be favorably reported to the House, it was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. There being now on the table as unfinished business several bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House last Friday, and as it is now nearly 4 o'clock, I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 60, noes 62.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum has voted, and I think we had better have tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman demand tellers?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. We could pass two more bills in the time which will be consumed by this count.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are more bills now pending in the House, coming over from last Friday, than we can dispose of during the rest of the day.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rules, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. JOHNSTON of Indiana.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 58.

So the motion of Mr. SPRINGER was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with the recommendation that they do pass.

JOHN HOLLINS M'BLAIR.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill pending and not disposed of, having been reported from the Committee of the Whole House on last Friday.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 199) for the relief of John Hollins McBlair.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion made last Friday by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to recommit this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Chair directed me to put the proposed instructions in writing, and I have done so.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposed instructions.

The Clerk read as follows:

That this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to ascertain and report whether a retiring-board of the United States Army, organized under the provisions of the act of August 3, 1861, to investigate the case of Lieut. J. H. McBlair, jr., did or did not find, in September, 1863, after mature deliberation and careful consideration of his case, that he was incapacitated for active service, and that his incapacity did not result from any incident of the service, and recommend that he be wholly retired from the service with one year's pay and allowance, and whether this finding of the retiring-board is true or not; and if not true, said committee shall ascertain and report to the House what was the cause of the incapacity of said McBlair for active service, and whether he contracted his disease or disability before or after entering the United States service. Said committee shall also ascertain and report to the House whether the findings and recommendations of retiring-boards have not equal force and effect as the findings and recommendations of courts-martial, and whether Congress has the right to review such findings and recommendations after they have been approved by the President and set them aside, as is proposed in the pending bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that several bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that a demand for the previous question is pending; and the motion to recommit is not debatable except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRAGG. I object. The gentleman has got in one speech in the paper which has just been read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to show that these bills are substantially the same as the Fitz-John Porter bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recommit the bill with the instructions just read.

The motion of Mr. SPRINGER was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon ordering the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, as the previous question has just been ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not on the passage of the bill? I understood it was on ordering the bill to a third reading.

The SPEAKER. That was done last Friday. The demand for the previous question on the passage of the bill was made at that time, and pending that the gentleman from Illinois moved to recommit. The question is now on the passage of the bill.

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER said: The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 11 voting in favor thereof.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know that these gentlemen do not want to go on the record on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The ayes have it; and the bill is passed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for a division on the question of the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman demand a division. The gentleman now states, as the Chair understands, that he demanded a division before the result was announced. The Chair always accepts a statement of that character.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not demand a division before the Speaker announced the result, because I did not know that both sides of the question had been taken. When I heard the Chair announce that the bill had passed I then demanded a division, because I had not heard both sides of the question put.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair thinks the demand was too late. The vote taken was merely viva voce, and the Chair announced that "the ayes seemed to have it." Thereupon the gentleman from Illinois demanded the yeas and nays, which were refused by the House, and then the Chair announced the result upon the viva voce vote.

Mr. BRAGG. I move to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill, and to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for a division on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 11.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point of order of no quorum having been made, the Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. BRAGG.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 119, noes 44.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 3428) for the relief of V. F. Gorrisen;

A bill (H. R. 290) for the relief of L. S. Ensel;

A bill (H. R. 4411) for the relief of A. Gates Lee;
A bill (H. R. 822) for the relief of William H. Wheeler;
A bill (H. R. 4412) for the relief of John A. Coan; and
A bill (H. R. 832) for the relief of J. E. Downing.

BILLS PASSED WITH AMENDMENTS.

Amendments to bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, were agreed to, and the bills as amended were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 68) for the relief of William P. Chambliss;
A bill (H. R. 899) for the relief of A. S. Bloom; and
A bill (H. R. 897) for the relief of the heirs at law of Andrew F. McMillin, deceased.

JOHN HATFIELD, DECEASED.

The bill (H. R. 212) for the relief of Alfred G. Hatfield was reported back from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, together with the bill (S. 296) for the relief of the legal representatives of John Hatfield, deceased, with the recommendation that the House bill be laid on the table and the Senate bill be passed.

The House bill was laid on the table, and the Senate bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WOLFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 68) for the relief of William P. Chambliss was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 3428) for the relief of V. F. Gorrisen was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALSELL moved to reconsider the several votes by which the other bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. HAMMOND. It has been usual, during the long session of Congress to adjourn over for Washington's birthday. At any rate the Departments will be closed that day, and as Tuesday will be Cabinet day it will in any event be impossible to do any departmental business until Wednesday next if it be not done to-morrow. Therefore I move when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

FREE COINAGE OF SILVER.

Mr. BLAND. I ask by unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Tuesday, the 2d of March next, after the morning hour for the consideration of bills, the House shall proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 5690, for the free coinage of silver, and other purposes, and that the same shall be so considered from day to day until disposed of, not to interfere with general appropriation and revenue bills or to prevent the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures from using any morning hour when said Committee may be called from calling up said bill.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

Mr. JAMES. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his objection until I can make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The objection is insisted upon, and the resolution is not before the House.

Mr. BAKER. I ask by unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to say that if I had been present yesterday when the vote was taken I would have voted for the Fitz-John Porter bill as it passed the House.

CALL OF STATES.

Mr. PERKINS. As we have agreed to adjourn over until Tuesday next I hope by unanimous consent it will be agreed that on Tuesday the States and Territories will be called for the introduction of bills for reference.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We have adjourned over Monday and we may as well adjourn the business of Monday.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN (at twenty-two minutes to 5 o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until half past 7 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) resumed its session.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the special order fixed for Friday evening sessions.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the order under which the House assembles to-night.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

FRANCIS H. KIRMAYER.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1083) granting a pension to Francis H. Kirmayer.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Francis H. Kirmayer, late of Company G, Fifty-fourth Ohio Volunteers, to $72 a month.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suppose the reports in all of these cases, although they may not be read, will be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. That order will be made.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) is as follows:

Francis H. Kirmayer was a sergeant in Company G, Fifty-fourth Ohio Volunteers. He enlisted February 15, 1864, and was discharged May 24, 1865, for wounds received at Nickajack Creek, Georgia, by the bursting of a shell, which resulted in amputation of left leg above the knee; the same shell wounded the right knee-joint, breaking off a piece of the tibia, and at the same time threw him into the air several feet; that when he dropped to the ground he injured his back and head severely, and never has recovered from the effects of the same; he also received a bullet wound in the right thigh and another in the abdomen from spent balls.

This soldier was first pensioned from discharge to June 6, 1866, at $8 per month, increased to $15 from June 6, 1866, to $18 from June 8, 1872, $24 from June 4, 1874, and $30 from March 3, 1883, for loss of left leg above the knee.

He filed an application for increase April 2, 1884, alleging increase of disability from the wound of right leg which renders him helpless and unfit for performing any labor, has to be dressed and undressed, and has not been able to take care of himself unaided since he was shot, and that he is entitled to the rate provided by law for persons who require aid and attendance. This application was rejected September 15, 1884, on the ground "that he was receiving the full amount of pension to which he is entitled; the evidence not showing that degree of helplessness that would entitle him to $50 per month." An appeal was taken from the finding of the Pension Commissioner, and on the 14th day of March, 1885, the Secretary of the Interior reaffirmed the rejection of the Pension Department.

The evidence in the case all shows that the soldier is very greatly disabled and does require the aid and assistance of another person.

Drs. C. Pratt and Lewis S. Hopkins testify they have known claimant for the past ten years; that they know he has not performed any manual labor during that time, and that he needs the aid and attendance of another person more or less frequently.

Dr. Pratt aforementioned supplements his affidavit as above by saying he requires assistance in dressing at all times and can never be better; the evidence of these physicians is corroborated by Bridget O'Brien and Marie Allendorf that he needs regular aid and attendance and that they have assisted him.

The board of examining surgeons at Taunton who last examined him April 23, 1884, say:

"Left femur amputated at middle third; good stump. A large cicatrix on inside of right knee shows extensive wound and ulceration, cicatrix drawn, and smooth, knee weak, sometimes giving out suddenly (on one occasion caused him to chop off his left thumb); says he suffers pain and weakness in back in consequence of injury received at time of wound. We think he should be rated, (1) loss of thigh, present; (2) wound of right knee, total; (3) injury to back, 0."

From the statement of facts set forth in this claim, while the evidence does not show conclusively that this soldier is in that state of absolute helplessness requiring the constant care and attendance of another person, still it does show that without a certain amount of assistance he would be unable to get around and do for himself, being able to walk with the use of cane or crutch, and partly care for himself. The evidence shows that he is liable to sudden vertigo upon stooping, owing to swollen temporal veins, the result of the injury to his head.

His condition is such that his disabilities would entitle him to an advance upon his present rating of $30 per month, and still they are not of that extreme nature as to entitle him to the full amount, $50, allowed to those who are utterly incapacitated from helping themselves, and are obliged to have constant and regular care and attendance of another person.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as amended, by striking out the words "seventy-two" in last line and substituting therefor the word "forty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY B. CARLL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1106) granting a pension to Mary B. Carll.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary B. Carll, widow of Erastus B. Carll, late a lieutenant of Company —, Second Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) is as follows:

Mary B. Carll is the widow of Erastus B. Carll, late first lieutenant Company F, Second Massachusetts Infantry. He enlisted May 24, 1861, and was discharged May 30, 1864. He died November 9, 1878.

It is not shown that the soldier ever made application in his life. At the time of his death he left claimant, and a family of five small children, all under thirteen years of age. She applied for pension January 27, 1879, which was rejected January 9, 1882, on the ground that soldier's death was not due to his military service.

The evidence in the case shows that the soldier was in good health, sound, and robust at time of enlistment; that he contracted malarial disease in the Army, and that ever thereafter he suffered from it down to the day of his death.

William Cogswell, colonel of Second Massachusetts Volunteers, testifies:

"Soldier was in good health when he entered service, and in feeble health when discharged; have no doubt he contracted malaria in the service."

George W. Morse, first lieutenant Company I, Second Massachusetts, testifies to his general good health at enlistment, and that during the latter part of his service he seemed to be breaking down in health.

C. C. L. Moore, of Malden, Mass., testifies:

"That he knew soldier before the war. He was then in robust health, able-bodied; he resided at my father's house for two years, 1858-'59; never knew of his being sick or complaining. I next saw him in August, 1864; he was in a car with me. He had changed so much I would not have recognized him had he not spoken to me and told me who he was. His voice was very weak, and he seemed to be a changed man. I obtained employment for him in one of the storehouses in the navy-yard at Charlestown under my charge. He was run down in health, and while he remained in the yard he was a constant sufferer from what he said was malarial poison. He appeared stupid a great part of the time; his mind at times seemed to wander; he had but very little strength, and if he sat down he would be apt to fall asleep. He was a man of good moral character, temperate, and industrious. He worked under me up to the time he was taken ill with his last sickness."

Mary Galvin and Hugh McKenna, neighbors, testify that from his discharge to his death he complained of and was always suffering from malarial poisoning.

Dr. J. A. McDonald, of Boston, Mass., family physician, and who attended soldier in his last sickness, testifies:

"He had frequent attacks of intermittent malarial chills, chronic enlargement of liver and spleen, great debility, extreme emaciation, cough, and night sweats. During the two months I attended him previous to his death the above symptoms constantly increased, until four days previous to his death pleuro-pneumonia supervened and hastened a result which, even without the latter disease, would inevitably follow in the course of a few weeks. The acute attack in this case was caused largely, if not wholly, by the previous exhausted condition of patient. I am decidedly of the opinion that the essential cause of death was the chronic diseases which he contracted in the Army, and I am led to this conclusion by the fact that the pneumonia was so slight that it would not have occurred were it not for the condition of his system from the wasting effects of the malarial hepatic and previous lung disease which had so invaded his system."

Your committee are of the opinion the case is clearly proven and that the rejection by the Pension Department was purely technical. They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill with the following amendment: Insert the letter "F" in the sixth line, after the word "Company."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JESSE B. SCUDDER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 421) granting a pension to Jesse B. Scudder.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to place on the pension-roll the name of Jesse B. Scudder, of Industry, Ill., and pay him a pension at the rate of $8 per month from the 6th day of June, 1865, to the present time, and to continue at the same rate, unless increased.

The report (by Mr. NEECE) is as follows:

Jesse B. Scudder enlisted August 11, 1862, at Industry, Ill., in Company I, Seventy-eighth Illinois Infantry, and was honorably discharged June 6, 1865, from United States hospital at Quincy, Ill., on account of disabilities, which disability is recited in his discharge as being one-half. The Adjutant-General's report shows that Scudder was on duty with his regiment from the time of enlistment until October 18, 1864. At that date he was left sick at Chattanooga, Tenn., and the record shows him sick in the hospital until his discharge.

A certificate of disability, dated June 6, 1865, by D. G. Brinton, surgeon United States Volunteers, in charge of United States hospital at Quincy, Ill., certifies said Scudder is incapable of performing the duties of a soldier because of obscure injury to the spine. It seems that the hospital record of said regiment is not on file and has not been preserved; consequently the cause of his sickness while in the hospital does not appear of record. The above facts are in the Adjutant-General's report.

It appears from the evidence that in October, 1864, while Scudder was sick in the hospital at Chattanooga, Tenn., he was granted a furlough, and on October 31, 1864, was on his way home, along with a lot of other sick soldiers, under the charge of William H. Githens, assistant surgeon of the said regiment. That at or near La Fayette, Ind., the train upon the railroad upon which said soldiers were traveling collided with another train and a large number of the soldiers aboard were killed, and a large number of the remainder were crippled and injured in various ways by reason of said collision.

William H. Githens testifies that he was the assistant surgeon of the Seventy-eighth Illinois Regiment; that he was in charge of the furloughed soldiers at the time of the collision near La Fayette, Ind., October 31, 1864, and took care of the wounded; but he has no distinct recollection of treating or caring for Jesse B. Scudder, but that he believes he was injured, as very few escaped in the first passenger coach, but to what extent is unable to say.

It is proven that Scudder was in the first passenger coach mentioned by Dr. Githens. The evidence clearly shows that said Scudder, soon after the said collision, reached his home injured in the back, for which he was treated by Dr. Duncan; that he was shortly able to return to his regiment, which he did, and the records of the Adjutant-General's Office show that he was sick in the hospital until he was discharged. The evidence fully establishes the fact that he was a sound and healthy man at the time he enlisted.

It is also fully established by the evidence that said Scudder never has recovered from his injuries to his back. This is established by the evidence of several physicians.

Dr. Bendles, of Bushnell, Ill., who was the medical examiner of Scudder's district, certifies that he examined said Scudder; that he was suffering from an injury to his spine; that it disabled him fully one-half.

It further appears from the evidence that before said Scudder enlisted his occupation was a farmer, and that since the war, owing to his disabilities, he is disabled from performing labor upon a farm at least one-half of the time, and that he is subject to bad spells which disable him entirely for the time; that he is a man of a family, and is very poor, and owing to his disabilities he has had a very hard time to make a living for his family.

His case was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions on the ground that said Scudder was on a furlough at the time he received his injuries. Your committee is of the opinion that had the hospital records of said regiment been preserved they would have shown that he was on sick furlough at the time of receiving his injuries, insomuch as the assistant surgeon of the regiment was sent in charge of said sick soldiers; that while he was under the care and control of the surgeon of the regiment he was in the line of his duty, and if injured without fault on his part he should be entitled, in equity at least, to his pension.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendment:

Strike out of said bill all after the words "Industry, Illinois," and insert "of Company I, Seventy-eighth Illinois Regiment, and pay him a pension subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NATHAN HILDEBRANT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4586) for the relief of Nathan Hildebrant.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nathan Hildebrant, late of Company A, Thirty-first Regiment New Jersey Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) is as follows:

The claimant, Nathan Hildabrant, late private of Company A, Thirty-first Regiment of New Jersey Volunteers, filed his application for pension December 31, 1879, alleging disability from disease of the spine and kidneys, the result of an injury to his back by a fall while he was detailed, with other members of his company, to unload boats of grain and supplies at Belle Plains, Va., in January or February, 1863. The application was rejected March 19, 1884, on the ground that there was no record at the War Department showing that claimant was injured in service. The testimony in this case is voluminous, and comes from the best citizens of claimant's neighborhood, who testify from personal knowledge of the claimant. It is already proven that claimant, at the time of and prior to his enlistment, was a sound, able-bodied man and free from any disability, particularly disease of spine and kidneys, and four of his comrades testify that the injury was received as alleged, and that claimant was sent to regimental hospital for treatment, and afterward on his return to the company was cared for by these same and other comrades, doing but little duty and treated in camp. The surgeon of the regiment was unable to give any testimony because no records of treatment were in existence.

The physicians who have treated claimant since return from service testify to attacks of cerebro-spinal meningitis, the result of the injury to his spine and back, from which he never entirely recovered, and has become partially paralyzed in his limbs and back; that he is a constant sufferer from his injuries, and the disease grows gradually worse, and that he is totally incapacitated from performing any manual labor.

The testimony given by claimant's neighbors shows claimant to be completely broken down in health and totally incapacitated for labor, and that he has been so since his return from the service; that he is confined to his house for days and weeks at a time, and is almost a walking skeleton, being emaciated in form and obliged to use a cane constantly. This is a meritorious case, and your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Amend the bill by striking out the letter "e," in the name of the applicant, and inserting "a;" so it will read: "Hildabrant."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARCUS A. HAMILTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1508) for the relief of Marcus A. Hamilton.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Marcus A. Hamilton, formerly of Company K, First Regiment New Jersey Cavalry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) is as follows:

Marcus A. Hamilton, late of Company K, First Regiment New Jersey Cavalry Volunteers, filed his application for pension November 3, 1879, alleging disability from injury to left leg and hip received about December 15, 1864, at Petersburg, Va., by his horse falling upon him in jumping a ditch, for which he was treated in camp and excused from duty by regimental surgeons. The testimony of claimant's neighbors shows him to have been perfectly sound at the time of his enlistment and free from the disability claimed for. It is also proven by four of his comrades that he received the injury to left leg and hip while in the line of duty at the time and place and in the manner alleged.

Several physicians who have treated the claimant since his return from the service testify that the fall of the horse compressed the sciatic nerve, as well as the ligaments and soft parts, and as to their having treated claimant for chronic sciatica and other resulting troubles from this injury by cupping, blistering, and internal treatment, and that he suffers constantly from pains in his left leg and hip, and the disability is permanent and one which renders him unable to perform manual labor at least one-half his time. It is also shown that since discharge claimant has suffered continuously from his injuries and largely incapacitated for work.

The committee deem this a worthy case and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FANNY COLLINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3516) granting a pension to Fanny Collins.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Fanny Collins, widow of Louis Collins, deceased, late a private in Company H, Fifty-eighth Regiment United States Colored Troops.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) is as follows:

Lewis Collins, the husband of claimant, was enrolled as private in Company H, Fifty-eighth Regiment United States Colored Troops, April 27, 1864, and died at Natchez, Miss., May 9, 1864, of small-pox. The claimant, his widow, filed her application for pension November 23, 1878, and it was rejected June 19, 1879, on the ground that the soldier's fatal disease, small-pox, was not contracted in the service and line of duty.

The records of the Surgeon-General show that the soldier entered regimental hospital, Natchez, Miss., April 28, 1864, with intermittent fever, disposition not stated, and died in small-pox hospital, Natchez, Miss., May 9, 1864, of small-pox.

The Adjutant-General reports the soldier on the muster-roll of Company H, Fifty-eighth United States Colored Troops, for the months of March and April, 1864; that he was reported present for duty, with remark, "Joined, a recruit, April 27, 1864; that the record of enrollment is taken from company muster-roll for March and April, 1864, there being no enlistment paper or muster-in roll of him on file."

The testimony filed shows the claimant to have been formerly a slave and legally married to the soldier; that they had no children and she has not married since his death; that the soldier left home in good health; that the claimant was dependent on him for support, and that she is very poor and in every way deserving of aid.

The rejection of the claim was based on an opinion by the medical reviewer, who reported as follows:

"Enlisted April 27, 1864; died May 8, 1864; eleven days after enlistment * * * allow only ten days for period of incubation and it gives but one day for development of disease and death. Disease must have originated prior to enlistment."

The muster-roll showing the soldier as a member of said company for at least two months prior to alleged enlistment, and the testimony that, prior to his entry in the service, soldier was in good, sound, physical health, your committee consider that his service as a member of said company began prior to alleged enlistment or joining of recruit, and that the disease of small-pox was contracted while in the service and line of duty, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL C. PECK, JR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4131) for the relief of Samuel C. Peck, jr.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel C. Peck, jr., of Plainfield, N. J., late captain of Company A, Sixth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, said pension to begin from the date of his filing claim numbered 464249 in the Pension Office.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) is as follows:

The claimant, Samuel C. Peck, jr., enlisted September 17, 1861, as first lieutenant in Company F, Sixth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, and October 24, 1863, was promoted to captain of Company A of the same regiment. He was discharged June 29, 1864, on tender of resignation, accompanied by surgeon's certificate of disability. He filed his application for pension November 6, 1882, alleging disability from an injury to both ankles, the result of a fall while with his company in the line of duty at Drury's Bluff, Virginia, in May, 1864, and November 27, 1883; his application was rejected, on the ground that the disability existed in right ankle at the time of and prior to enlistment.

The claimant admits that he had a weakness in one of his ankles, but that he fully recovered from it many years before his entry into the service, and that prior to his enlistment it is shown by testimony of others that he had done military duty. Neighbors living near to him at the time of his enlistment testify as to his being sound and in good health, and Lorenzo Meeker, the colonel of the regiment, also testifies that the claimant was in good, sound bodily health before and at the time of his enlistment; that he was a good officer, and contracted the injury by falling and spraining both ankles at the time and place alleged, and was carried to the rear; that it was some weeks before his return from the hospital to his company, and that he tried to do duty, but his ankles gave out, and he was honorably discharged. Other officers of the regiment also testify that claimant sprained both his ankles at the time and place and in the manner alleged.

The surgeon granting the certificate of disability on which he was discharged stated that he found claimant suffering from necrosis of the left tarsal bones, of long standing, aggravated by a severe sprain of the ankle-joint, and it was upon this report that the application was rejected. The testimony furnished by claimant shows clearly that he was sound at entry into service, and that the statement made by the surgeon in granting certificate of disability was incorrect, and that the injury to both ankles was received in the line of duty; besides, he had been in the service at the time of contracting this disability nearly three years, and should be considered, by recent ruling of the Pension Office, as sound at date of enlistment.

The testimony presented as to claimant's condition since discharge shows that he has been, since his discharge, a constant sufferer from his injuries, and in a large measure incapacitated for work.

Your committee think that the mere opinion of the physician, given perhaps hurriedly and thoughtlessly, should not outweigh the strong evidence given as to soundness at date of enlistment, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Striking out, after the word "volunteers," line 8, the words "said pension to begin from the date of his filing claim numbered 464249 in the Pension Office."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AURELIA F. ROBBINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1024) granting a pension to Aurelia F. Robbins.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month, from and after the passage of this act, the name of Aurelia F. Robbins, dependent sister of the late Daniel Robbins, of the Second Maine Battery.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) is as follows:

Aurelia F. Robbins is the daughter of Daniel Robbins, a private in Company B, Second Battery, First Regiment of Maine Light Artillery Volunteers. He was discharged for disability, subsequently pensioned, and died May 6, 1873. The soldier's wife—mother of Aurelia F.—died in 1865. Some confusion seems to have arised from the fact that Aurelia F. filed two separate claims for pension, at different dates; one as dependent daughter of Daniel Robbins, and the other as dependent sister of soldier of same name, the service of the latter being indefinitely stated as "Maine" (no company or regiment). The latter claim appears not to have been pressed further than the filing of application. The former was rejected upon the ground that claimant was over the age of sixteen years at the date of death of the soldier.

The papers filed with this committee show that there were two Daniel Robbinses, father and son; that the son, brother of claimant, was in a Massachusetts regiment, the number of which is not known, and was supposed to have been killed in the battle of the Wilderness.

These papers also show that the claimant's present condition is most pitiful, and appeals in the strongest manner to every human sympathy. She is a cripple, having lost the use of her legs by an accident when two years of age, and has never been able to walk a step since. Her limbs are now no larger than when she met with the accident which caused her misfortune, and she has to crawl or creep around with her hands. She is utterly destitute, a town pauper, and has at times suffered for the actual necessaries of life. She has no relatives who can aid her. These facts are established by several sworn affidavits and by unsworn statements of D. L. Savage, of Foxcroft, Me., whose standing is attested by Hon. CHARLES A. BOUTELLE, a member of this House.

Your committee report favorably upon this bill, and recommend its passage, with the following amendments, namely: Strike out all from the word "subject," in fourth line, to the word "laws," in the fifth line, inclusive, and insert "at the rate of $12 per month from and after the passage of this act." Strike out all after the word "dependent," in the sixth line, and insert "daughter of the late Daniel Robbins, a private in Company B (Second Battery), First Regiment of Maine Light Artillery."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AMANDA RODGERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4224) for the relief of Amanda Rodgers.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Amanda Rodgers, widow of Matthew B. Rodgers, late of Company C, First Regiment United States Dragoons, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

Mr. PERKINS. I think we had better have the report read in that case.

Mr. BRADY. I will ask, Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent, by reason of the absence of the gentleman having charge of these two bills, this one and number 1345, immediately following it upon the Calendar, that they be passed over informally for the present, retaining their place on the Calendar. I speak for the committee in this regard.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not wish the bill number 1345 passed over.

Mr. BRADY. Very well. I did not know the gentleman was here when I made the request; but I ask that the bill now before us be passed over informally owing to the absence of the gentleman having charge of it.

Mr. SWOPE. I hope the bill will be laid aside.

There being no objection, the bill was passed over informally, to retain its place upon the Calendar.

NATHANIEL H. BLAKELY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1345) granting a pension to Nathaniel H. Blakely.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nathaniel H. Blakely, formerly of Company F, Third Regiment Missouri Mounted Volunteers, in the war with Mexico.

The report (by Mr. A. C. WHITE) is as follows:

Nathaniel H. Blakely was a private in Company H, Third Regiment Missouri Mounted Volunteers, in the war with Mexico. He was enlisted April 27, 1847, and mustered out with his company October 19, 1848, at Independence, Mo. The rolls of the company from September 1, 1847, to August 31, 1848, are not on file in the office of the Adjutant-General. Mr. Blakely alleges in his affidavit that at Taos, N. Mex., in the winter of 1847 or 1848 (he is not certain as to the year), he lost the sight of his left eye from exposure on guard duty before he had fully recovered from an attack of the mumps. He further states that he was treated in the hospital at Taos, N. Mex., by Dr. Maxwell, and remained under his treatment three or four weeks. His eye was sound before the attack which sent him to the hospital. Since that attack, and in consequence thereof, he has totally lost the sight of his left eye.

James A. Robertson and G. D. Sego, both residents of Worth County, Missouri, testify that they knew Nathaniel H. Blakely, and that the loss of his left eye was caused by exposure while in the line of duty at or near Taos, N. Mex., in the winter of 1847 or 1848. These affiants further state that—

"They knew the said soldier before he enlisted, at the time he enlisted, and were with him during the time he was in service; and saw said soldier while he was disabled with the mumps, and know that he was placed on guard duty before he was fully recovered from the mumps, which caused him to take a severe cold, which caused his jaw to swell up and inflame, which settled in his left eye, causing the loss of his sight."

They also state that at the time of enlistment and prior to the attack of mumps claimant was in sound health and free from disease, and that the sight of the left eye was perfect. Claimant states under oath that he has no knowledge of the whereabouts of either one of his commissioned officers or the surgeon who treated him. He does not know whether they are living or dead.

William Prewitt and Jesse Creekmore, who have known claimant since 1839, make oath as to his loyalty during the late civil war.

Hon. A. M. DOCKERY states that he has known claimant for fifteen years, and knows him to be honest, honorable, and reliable.

In view of all these facts your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID C. PAULLUS.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 19) for the relief of David C. Paullus.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David C. Paullus, late a private in Company D, Second Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, in the war with Mexico.

The report (by Mr. BRADY) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19) granting a pension to David C. Paullus, submit the following report:

This bill passed this House by a unanimous vote at the last Congress. The Committee on Pensions at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress made a favorable report on this bill, which is adopted by this committee, and reads as follows:

"In the Pension Office the claim of David C. Paullus stands rejected 'because the records of the War Department do not show the existence of the alleged disability in the service,' the soldier having claimed his pension because of rupture incurred while on the march from Vera Cruz to San Juan, Mexico, in 1848. But after examining the evidence the committee are of the opinion that said Paullus is clearly entitled to a pension, and report back the bill with the recommendation that it pass, namely:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David C. Paullus, late a private in Company D, Second Regiment of Ohio Volunteers in the war with Mexico.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MILTON R. MUZZY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2549) granting a pension to Milton R. Muzzy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Milton R. Muzzy, late a sergeant of Company K, Third United States Artillery, and grant him a pension of $8 a month, commencing with the date of his discharge from said artillery.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. BRADY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 2549, have considered the same, and report as follows:

Milton R. Muzzy entered the United States Army as a private in January, 1830, and served almost continuously until June 21, 1841, when he was discharged a sergeant of Company K, Third Artillery.

During the Florida war, in the latter part of the year 1838, at Fort Lauderdale, near the mouth of New River, he was detailed with others to unload commissary stores from a steamboat into a yawl-boat lying alongside. While so engaged a barrel of provisions being lowered from the steamboat to the yawl, in which Muzzy was stationed, fell and struck him full in the breast, knocking him over backward, causing his back to strike heavily against the rail of the yawl-boat, severely injuring him in the region of the kidneys; he was placed in the post hospital for treatment, and while there suffered from passing bloody urine, and was much troubled about walking, caused by the hurt.

He is now eighty years of age, and in April, 1881, became totally paralyzed, a result from the injury received. He is not able to move or help himself, and is entirely dependent on others to even place his food in his mouth, and has no means of support.

Assistant Adjutant-General S. N. Benjamin, in a letter to Muzzy of February 23, 1878, states that—

"From the records of this office (Adjutant-General's Office) you served honorably, and were discharged as follows: January 25, 1835, a corporal of Company B, Fourth Artillery; February 11, 1838, a sergeant of Company I, Third Infantry; and June 21, 1841, a sergeant of Company K, Third Artillery."

Your committee report the bill without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that that bill carries arrearages back to 1841.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BRADY. I propose to amend the bill so that the pension shall take effect from the passage of the act.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. All right. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PERKINS. I would suggest that according to the report this applicant, if entitled to anything, is entitled to much more than $8 a month. The bill somewhat inconsistently puts him on the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension law and yet fixes the pension. I think we should strike out the one provision or the other. It appears to me that portion of the bill which fixes the pension should be eliminated.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I think that is a good suggestion.

Mr. BRADY. I have no objection to accepting that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill as now proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Milton R. Muzzy, late a sergeant of Company K, Third United States Artillery.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY].

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ELIZABETH STOCKSDALE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4022) granting a pension to Elizabeth Stocksdale.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Stocksdale, widow of Aaron Stocksdale, deceased, late of the Thirty-sixth Maryland Militia, war of 1812-'14.

The report (by Mr. BRADY) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4022) directing the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Elizabeth Stocksdale, widow of Aaron Stocksdale, deceased, a soldier in the war of 1812-'14, have duly considered the same, and report:

The evidence in the case shows that Aaron Stocksdale served as a private in Capt. Eli Stocksdale's company, Thirty-sixth Maryland Volunteers, in the war of 1812-'14; that during said service said Aaron Stocksdale was called home by the illness of his mother, and that on her recovery he returned to his company, and served until the close of said war. It also further shows that the said Elizabeth Stocksdale intermarried with the said Aaron on the 12th day of May, 1813, and lived with him as his wife until his death, which occurred on the 1st day of October, 1867, since which time she has remained, and still is, a widow, and has always been loyal to the Government of the United States.

Your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

KATE AMANN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 441) granting a pension to Kate Amann.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Kate Amann, widow of Philip Amann, late a private in Company D, Seventy-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 441, beg leave to submit the following report:

A similar bill having passed this committee and the House in the Forty-eighth Congress, and not having been reached in the Senate, your committee adopt the report of this committee of the Forty-eighth Congress, as follows:

That Kate Amann is the widow of Philip Amann, who was a private in Company D, Seventy-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and who was discharged from the service February 25, 1863, on account of two gunshot wounds received at the second Bull Run battle, August 30, 1862, one ball having passed through the right leg, the other through the right foot. That he was pensioned on account of said wounds to date from the time of his discharge, and continued to receive a pension until the time of his death, November 15, 1880, which occurred in the following manner:

"The evidence shows the fact that, while engaged with others working in a stone-yard, the derrick used by them for moving and hoisting stone fell on the said Amann, crushing him to death. This accident occurred through no fault nor by any negligence on the part of the said Amann. And in the opinion of your committee, had it not been for his disabled condition caused by his wounds he would have been enabled to escape the injury which resulted in his death; that those who were engaged with him at the time of his death, and who were exposed to the danger in as great a degree as the said Amann was, did escape death by reason of the fact that they possessed the full use of their limbs. Your committee further find that the said Amann was a sober and industrious man, of good moral character.

"That the claimant, Kate Amann, is in reduced circumstances, supporting herself and family by washing and such other hard labor as she can get to do.

"In consideration of all the facts, the committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SAMUEL HANSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3100) granting a pension to Samuel Hanson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel Hanson, late a private in Company D, Thirty-fourth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3100) granting a pension to Samuel Hanson, submit the following report:

This soldier enlisted January 16, 1864, in Company D, Thirty-third Regiment Iowa Volunteers, and was mustered out with his company August 15, 1865. In 1870 he applied for a pension, alleging disability from lung disease; that in March, 1864, at Little Rock, Ark., he was attacked with lung fever from exposure while in service, which seriously affected his lungs, and from which he never recovered. The Adjutant-General's report shows that he was left sick at Little Rock March 23, 1864. The Surgeon-General's report shows that he was admitted to general hospital at Little Rock March 22, 1864, for treatment for "pleuro-pneumonia," and returned to duty April 11, 1864.

Riley Jessup, late captain of Company D, in affidavit made September 23, 1870, states:

"At Little Rock, March, 1864, while in line of duty claimant was attacked by lung fever, brought on by exposure in the service; said disease affected his lungs, and that they continued affected until discharge; that his lungs were not affected at the time of enlistment or prior to said attack of lung fever; that claimant was of good habits while in the service, and in affiant's opinion the disease was the result of unavoidable exposure."

Dr. D. A. Hoffman states:

"Claimant was examined by me before he enlisted, for the purpose of ascertaining whether he was a sound man physically. That at that time he was not affected with any disease of the lungs. On his return from the service, immediately after his discharge, I treated him for disease of the lungs, which was the result of acute inflammation of the lungs, contracted while he was in service. I have treated him for the said disease at various times since September, 1865, to the present time (December, 1870), and his disease still continues."

The testimony is ample and undisputed that his disease has continued ever since, except that Dr. Huntsman, of Oskaloosa, the examining surgeon, said in 1872 that he found no disease of the lungs. A few months later another examining surgeon says:

"I find upon examination that the applicant has a deep, hollow cough, expectorating purulent and muco-purulent matter, night sweats, and emaciation; auscultation shows, in the upper portion of the left lung, cavernous râle; respiration and voice amphoric; dullness on percussion over the whole left lung; the lower portion very dull, and can not ascertain that air passes into that portion of it. He is physically unable to perform manual labor."

A few months later Dr. W. S. Orr, examining surgeon at Ottumwa, reports him totally incapacitated from obtaining a sustenance by manual labor, and says the disability is probably permanent.

It would seem as though nothing was wanting to establish a case in the Pension Department, but two special examiners were sent out and a mass of contradictory evidence was submitted, and the case was finally rejected on the ground that claimant's lungs were affected when he went into service. If the evidence submitted by the special examiners proves anything, it proves that the soldier was a weak man, physically unfit for the service, when he was accepted; that he was a hale, hearty man after his discharge, working at heavy work in a stone-quarry and receiving full wages; that he was before enlistment a sound, rugged young man of excellent habits, and at the same time a confirmed drunkard; that he had a severe consumptive cough; and by other witnesses equally reliable it is proven that he "never had the least symptoms of anything being the matter with his lungs prior to his going into the Army; that he was frequently employed to chop wood and split rails, and was noted as a first-rate wood-chopper." The Commissioner of Pensions in 1878 was evidently bewildered by this mass of contradictory evidence, for in a letter to claimant's agent he says:

"The invalid pension claim No. 162081, of Samuel Hanson, was rejected September 16, 1875, upon competent evidence (medical and lay) elicited by special examinations, showing that the alleged disease was not due to the service; in other words, that his lungs were diseased at the time he enlisted, and that the principal cause of his disability was due to an attack of lung fever since his discharge. It is proper to add that an examination made March 2, 1872, fails to discover any disease of the lungs."

This is certainly being equal to the occasion. The disability existed before enlistment, the disability was caused by lung fever after enlistment, and finally the disability never existed at all.

The simple facts seem to be that some two months after enlistment the soldier had an acute attack of lung fever, from which he has never recovered, and that he is now totally incapacitated from performing manual labor. By the passage of this bill his few remaining years will be made comparatively comfortable. He loses the twenty years of arrears to which he seems to have been as clearly entitled as his more fortunate comrades who received them. Believing that simple justice requires that the Government should care for this soldier, your committee recommend the passage of this bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

DANIEL B. RANDALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4591) granting a pension to Daniel B. Randall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Daniel B. Randall, late of Company A, One hundred and second Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4501) granting a pension to Daniel B. Randall, submit the following report:

Your committee find that claimant enlisted in Company A, One hundred and second Illinois Volunteers, July 28, 1862, and was discharged June 6, 1865. On the 18th of July, 1879, he applied for pension, alleging that "while in line of duty returning from hospital to join his regiment he fell, striking his right side on a stump, fracturing his ribs, which caused epilepsy."

Claimant, in his affidavit, says:

"I was on my way from a hospital in Jeffersonville, Ind., with a squad of convalescents belonging to different regiments, and on their way to join their commands, there being only one from my regiment, a member of Company A, by the name of Doggett, who died within a month or two after at Gallatin, Tenn. I do not remember the names of any of the persons belonging to the squad or the organizations to which they belonged, as they were all strangers to me. The only treatment that I received while in the service was occasional bleeding by the assistant surgeon, Dr. Hamilton, who, I have been informed by comrades, died shortly after the close of the war."

His family physician and three of his neighbors, who are reported as bearing excellent reputations, testify fully as to his soundness at enlistment, and speak of such an intimate acquaintance with him that it would seem to have been impossible for him to be affected with a disease of that character without their having knowledge of it.

His captain testifies that—

"Claimant was away at hospital and returned between 26th of September and 15th of November, 1862. Several men were left sick at Frankfort, Ky., October 26, 1862, when the regiment moved to Bowling Green and thence to Scottville, Tenn. Upon the arrival of these men to join their companies this accident was reported. Further I do not know, except that said Randall did suffer from frequent fits of epilepsy from that time until his discharge. He could have been discharged at any time after his sickness, but he would not make application for such discharge."

The evidence of continuance of the disease from discharge to the present time is abundant and conclusive. The case was rejected in the Pension Office on the ground of "No record or other satisfactory evidence that alleged disability (injury to side and resulting epilepsy) was received while in line of duty." This is strictly correct. There is no evidence to show that claimant was in line of duty when he received the fall. He gives good reasons for his inability to prove this, i. e., the fact that the squad of men under his charge was made up from different commands, and that he can not remember their names. Every old soldier can appreciate this reason.

But it is shown by overwhelming testimony that he was a sound, vigorous, healthy man of thirty years of age when he enlisted; that he afterward became subject to fits of epilepsy, which continued during the remainder of his service (more than two years), and that he has been thus afflicted ever since. That he was a brave and gallant soldier is proven by the fact that though afflicted with this terrible malady he refused to accept a discharge and served until the expiration of his term of service as a non-commissioned officer of his company. The absolute proof of the fall is lacking, and it is not shown that it was received in line of duty, though that your committee feel can be fairly assumed, for the proof is overwhelming that he incurred a terrible disease in the service, from which he still suffers.

Your committee feel that this is a case richly deserving the action of Congress, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIS W. FINK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4572) granting a pension to Willis W. Fink.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Willis W. Fink, late of Company D, Forty-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4572) granting a pension to Willis W. Fink, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted August 1, 1861, in, and was discharged September 25, 1865, from, Company D, Forty-fourth Illinois Volunteers; that in 1879 he applied for a pension, alleging "that on the 24th day of June, 1864, at Marietta, Ga., while assisting to carry a log on top of the breastworks, they were charged upon by the enemy, causing the men to let go the log, and the heavy weight came on him, by which he received a rupture of the left groin." This was rejected on the ground of no record and no testimony of eye-witnesses showing when, where, and under what circumstances it occurred, &c.

Three comrades testify that claimant received an injury on the day and in the manner claimed by him. The regimental surgeon testifies that he examined him June 27, 1864:

"That claimant came to him complaining of pain in his right groin, and said the pain was aggravated by any exertion. Said he had felt the pain at the time and since a heavy lift on a log that they were placing on the breastworks that day. I examined the groin and found a tumor, showing to me a disposition to hernia, and I put him off duty."

There is no evidence of medical treatment after service, but an abundance of lay testimony that the rupture existed in service and at time of discharge. The examining surgeon in 1881, and a board of examining surgeons in 1884, describe the hernia. The latter say:

"We find oblique inguinal hernia of right side, with opening that is difficult to retain with a truss."

The case seems a very strong one. The proof is not positive, for no one saw him in a nude state the instant before the injury and immediately after, but there can be no question that he was injured at the time he claims. He was then on his fourth year in the service, and it is hardly supposable that he had suffered all that time from rupture without its being known in his company. That it existed at time of discharge is admitted by the Department.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT MORAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5551) for the relief of Robert Moran.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension paid to Robert Moran, late lieutenant-colonel of the Second Regiment of West Virginia Volunteers, to $45 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

Mr. BRADY. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4120) for the relief of Robert Moran, submit the following report:

Your committee find that Robert Moran was lieutenant-colonel of the Second West Virginia Volunteers. Was mustered July 4, 1861, and was discharged May 19, 1862. In 1876 he applied for a pension for asthma, which was allowed, and he received $15 per month from discharge until 1880, and since that date $30 per month. This bill asks that he be paid the difference between $15 and $30 from the date of his discharge till 1880. As the rating seems to have been made in accordance with existing laws and the reports of the examining surgeons, your committee see no reason why the bill should not pass in its present form. But the evidence discloses the fact that he has been a great sufferer for many years; that at times he needs the aid and attention of another person, and that at no time is it safe for him to be left alone.

The examining surgeon at Columbus, Nebr., in his report dated February 21, 1883, says:

"The disability is permanent in this degree, and probably will grow worse as claimant grows older. He is growing feebler every year. He does require the regular aid and attendance of another person, as contemplated in your instructions to surgeons (as I understand the instructions). It is a fact, however, that after he is washed, dressed, and has his meals he is permitted to go around the streets in fair weather without the actual presence of another person, though a system of espionage is kept up constantly over him. I am sure, were you to see the man, you would not think the rating too high; further, I believe, though I am not sure of it, that incipient phthisis is developing. His nutrition is very bad, and, from his statements, I think he must be helpless at times."

The Department can grant no increase between $30, the rate for total inability to perform any manual labor, and $50, the rate where the constant aid and attention is required. His condition is much worse than that of a person simply unable to perform manual labor. He says for twenty years he has not been able to sleep all night in a bed. His sufferings are terrible. Believing that, while the relief asked for by this bill can not be properly granted, he ought to have a higher rating of pension than he is now receiving, your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for bill H. R. 4120.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Let the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BRADY. I think, if there be no objection, we may take a vote on the bill.

Mr. PRICE. There are objections. I shall object so far as recording my vote is concerned. I want to vote against that proposition, but I shall not object to the extent of breaking up this session.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LIZZIE KENAMORE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4112) granting a pension to Lizzie Kenamore, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that this bill be laid aside for the present, holding its place on the Calendar. There is a strong probability that if it has not already passed the Pension Department it will do so soon.

There being no objection, the bill was passed over informally.

MARY M. GALLEYAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3941) granting a pension to Mary M. Galleyan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary M. Galleyan, widow of Joseph S. Galleyan, late of Company G, Fifty-ninth Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3941) granting a pension to Mary M. Galleyan, submit the following report:

Your committee find that claimant is the widow of Joseph S. Galleyan, late a private of Company G, Fifty-ninth Indiana Volunteers. This soldier died November 2, 1873, of chronic diarrhea. The evidence shows that he was drafted January, 1865, and discharged July, 1865. The widow applied for pension in June, 1877, which was rejected, though no reason is given. The hospital record shows that the soldier was admitted July 3, 1865, with diarrhea. Samuel Rebstock testifies:

"The soldier was first taken with diarrhea about the 28th of April, which stuck to and disabled him until the time of his discharge. I lived within half a mile of said Galleyan after his discharge until in February, 1866, during which time I was intimately acquainted with him, and he was never free from the diarrhea."

Dr. Samuel W. Gould says he treated him from August, 1868, till July, 1870, for the same disease.

Dr. John M. Rochhold testifies that he had been acquainted with him for about one year before his death; that he attended him at the time of his death, and that the immediate cause of his death was chronic diarrhea; that it must have existed for a long time prior to his acquaintance with him.

The widow declares her inability to furnish further evidence. The incurrence of the disease in the service seems to be fully established; that it existed February, 1866, and August, 1868, and continued until his death is also clearly shown; that he died from the effects of that disease is proven. The reasonable conclusion is that his death was caused by the disability incurred in service, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM G. SCHOONOZER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3390) to place the name of William G. Schoonozer on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William G. Schoonozer, father of James C. Schoonozer, late of Company E, One hundred and fourth Illinois, who died of wounds at Chattanooga on the 27th day of June, 1864, in general hospital, ward numbered 6.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3390) to place the name of William G. Schoonozer on the pension-roll, submit the following report:

We find that claimant is the father of James C. Schoonozer, of Company E, One hundredth and fourth Illinois Volunteers; that the soldier died from the effects of wounds received in battle, and that his mother was allowed a pension until her death in September, 1878. The father's claim was rejected on the ground that he was able to support himself. The evidence shows that after the death of the mother, and about 1881, claimant sold his little farm, receiving therefor $300; that after erecting a stone to her grave and paying doctors' bills he had $150; that he was well, active, and strong for one of his age (then seventy-one years), and could earn $1 per day at light work. The special examiner in his report made December 4, 1882, and from which the above statement of evidence is obtained, sums up his findings as follows:

"It is my opinion, from observation and the testimony obtained in the case, that the following facts exist: (1) That claimant is the father of James C. Schoonozer, who was a private in Company E, One hundred and fourth Illinois Volunteers; that said James C. Schoonozer was wounded while in the service and line of duty, and died from the effects of said wound. (2) That claimant was partially dependent on said soldier for support at the date of said soldier's enlistment. (3) That claimant is and has been since the death of his wife (the mother of soldier, who died September, 1878, and who drew pension as dependent mother) able to and has supported himself by manual labor."

The old man is now seventy-six years of age. His only son fills a soldier's grave. He fell in battle with his face toward the enemy. Will the Congress of the United States refuse to pension this father because he is able to support himself by manual labor at the ripe old age of seventy-six years?

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

N. M. MILLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 737) granting a pension to N. M. Miller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of N. M. Miller, late of Company B, Ninety-first Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 737) granting a pension to N. M. Miller, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted August 16, 1862, in the Ninety-first Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and was discharged May 26, 1865. June, 1880, he filed application for a pension, alleging heart disease. June 1, 1885, the claim was rejected on the ground that there was "no record of heart disease, nor evidence of medical treatment in service. The evidence is insufficient to show the same due to the service." The evidence in this case seems to prove conclusively—it having been thoroughly investigated by special examiners of the Pension Department—that claimant was a strong, robust man at time of enlistment. That about August 1, 1864, he was admitted to the hospital at Marietta, Ga., with epistaxis; that he also had scurvy and chronic diarrhea; that he continued to suffer from these diseases, and especially from epistaxis, very severely until his discharge; that he complained also of heart disease in the spring of 1865. He was a practicing physician before he entered the service, and at one time in the service had charge of the regimental hospital. It seems to be well established that he had heart disease and that it has continued ever since.

The evidence shows that he was a good soldier. The difficulty in the Pension Department seems to have been to decide as to the cause of the heart disease. The evidence shows that claimant was addicted to the use of alcoholic drinks, and the medical referee, it seems, was unable to decide whether the heart disease was the result of that habit or of the scurvy and epistaxis and the resultant impoverishment of the blood. In submitting the case to the medical referee the examiner says:

"He used to drink. He is now of excellent reputation and high professional standing. He has practiced since 1858, and hence can furnish no medical evidence as to treatment. For that reason the disease of heart can not be proven as an independent disability."

A number of his acquaintances, including Hon. B. W. PERKINS, a member of this Congress, testify that he is a man of high character, unquestionable veracity, and of good standing in his profession. It is not possible for him to prove that heart disease was not the result of the use of alcohol, but it is more reasonable to suppose that three years of exposure and hardship, a want of proper diet, and the deprivations incident to a soldier's life in the field, resulting in scurvy and chronic diarrhea, caused the disability from which he now suffers.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARTIN KIRK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1396) to pension Martin Kirk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Martin Kirk, late a private in Company E, Eighth Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1396) to pension Martin Kirk, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted August 19, 1863, and was discharged July 17, 1865. July, 1877, he applied for a pension, alleging "that on the 30th of September he contracted a fever; that he was salivated from mercurial treatment while under treatment for fever, which resulted in cough," &c. This was rejected on the ground of no record and inability to furnish evidence of commanding officer or surgeon. The records of the company show for September and October that he was absent sick in Polk County, but do not state the disease. The claimant says:

"The origin of my sickness, for which I make application for a pension, was from a spell of sickness contracted in the fall of 1863 while on a scout in the counties of Laclede and Webster, Missouri. I was brought from off the scout to Marshfield, Mo., where I lay sick with a fever for three or four weeks. After I was able to get up I found myself salivated from mercurial treatment. Being in this condition, I was detailed immediately after this sickness on the Shelby raid; was on the raid three weeks, exposed day and night. It ruined my health and brought on a permanent disease, which has produced a continuous cough and a spitting of corrupt matter and blood."

Dr. S. H. Headin, whose reputation is vouched for "as the very best," testifies that he treated the soldier in October, 1863, for congestion of the liver, caused from exposure in camp life.

R. M. Johnson, one of his comrades, swears that claimant was very sick in September and October at Marshfield, Mo., and that he was never able afterward to do active duty and frequently not able to perform any duty at all. James Bouldin, another comrade, testifies to the same facts.

Thomas B. Evans, a citizen of Polk County, a member of same company, says claimant was very sick with fever at Marshfield, September and October, 1863, and that he was never able for active duty afterward.

John A. Callahan, a citizen of Marshfield, testifies that he has known claimant since 1857; that he knows of his being sick at Marshfield; that he has not been well since; staid with him two days in 1865 and he was then spitting blood. Has known him ever since, and that he has been troubled with the cough and spitting of blood and corruption ever since.

Two other witnesses testify to having known him since discharge, and describe his condition the same as the last witness has. His family physician and eight others testify to his good health before enlistment. The examining surgeon at Springfield, Mo., November 28, 1881, reports him totally and permanently disabled.

The examining board at the same place, November 29, 1882, report:

"Applicant is feeble, emaciated, shrunken muscles and flabby; has chronic pharyngitis and some cough. Has rotten teeth and ulcerated, spongy, rotten gums; skin harsh and dry. Is debilitated, and walks with canes; disability total."

The evidence seems clear and straightforward. Five witnesses swear positively to the origin of the disease. These witnesses testify from personal knowledge to its continuance; the examining surgeons report as to his present condition. Nothing is shown to throw a cloud on any of the evidence offered, but the absence of a hospital record and of the evidence of the surgeon of the regiment was fatal to the case. Your committee find few cases referred to them with evidence so clear and conclusive. That the disease originated in the service, has continued ever since, and now exists, seem to be proven.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM TAYLOR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4580) to grant a pension to William Taylor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place the name of William Taylor, late a private in Company B, First Regiment of Nebraska Militia, on the pension-roll, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pension, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4580) to grant a pension to William Taylor, submit the following report:

We find that claimant was a member of Company B, First Nebraska Militia; enlisted August 13, 1864, and discharged February 13, 1865. This organization was under the command of an officer of the United States Volunteers, and co-operated with the United States forces, and was paid by the General Government. He filed his application, alleging that at Grand Island, Nebr., about November 30, 1864, he was injured by his horse falling on him, dislocating his shoulder. The case seems to have been fully proven in the Pension Office, but was finally rejected on the ground that it was barred by paragraph 3, section 4693, Revised Statutes.

The captain of the company and the regimental surgeon testify as to the facts in the case. A physician who treated him at discharge, and for years after, testifies that his injury was permanent and incurable. Neighbors testify to its continuance, and the examining board at Omaha report October, 1882, that he is half totally disabled. The only point in the case seems to be that he was a militiaman. The general rule, in Congress, has been to grant pensions to militiamen when wounded or injured in line of duty when their organization was under the command of a United States Army officer. This is shown to be the fact in this case.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out the word "volunteers," in fifth line, and inserting the word "militia."

The amendment recommended by the committee, striking out the word "volunteers," in the fifth line, and inserting the word "militia," was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

J. W. BENNETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 746) granting a pension to J. W. Bennett.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of J. W. Bennett, late an ensign in the United States Navy, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 746) granting a pension to J. W. Bennett, submit the following report:

We find that J. W. Bennett was appointed an acting ensign in the Navy February 20, 1865, and served on the Savannah from that date to March 13, 1865; on the Currituck from March 14, 1865, to July 27, 1865, and on the Nansemond from July 28 to August 8, 1865, when he was granted leave of absence. He was honorably discharged October 12, 1865.

Claimant in his affidavit says:

"That he is wholly unable to furnish the testimony or affidavit of a commissioned officer or two of the men belonging to the United States steamer Currituck at the time he met with the accident set forth in the application for invalid pension, for the reason that he does not now know the place of residence of any officer or man with whom he had the honor to serve, nor has he at any time since his discharge and the separation and dispersion of the command ever known the place of residence or whereabouts of either or any of the officers or men, he, immediately after his charge, having set out for the Western States, and not being bound either by relationship, friendship, or previous acquaintance with any of the members of said command, which was composed of men from most of the seafaring nations of the earth; that there was no surgeon on board at the time of his injury, which was caused by falling from the gunboat across the thwart seat of the boat waiting to convey him to a vessel to be searched, in Chesapeake Bay, in April, 1865, the fall resulting in a rupture of left groin; that the doctor's steward furnished him with a truss."

But he shows by the evidence of Acting Ensign Boivie that the rupture existed a few days after discharge. He testifies:

"He was acquainted with claimant at time of discharge, about the middle of October, 1865; that he was quite intimate with him, being a brother officer and countryman; says he is sure as to time, as he was about to go, and did go, to Sweden a few days after; that they boarded at same house together, and claimant wore a truss, and explained to affiant that he was ruptured, and that it was caused by a fall into a cutter that was waiting to take him to a vessel in Chesapeake Bay."

Anton Williams testifies that he became acquainted and was intimate with claimant early in 1866, and he knows that he was then ruptured.

A number of witnesses testify to claimant's high character for truth and veracity from a long and intimate acquaintance with him. There is nothing in the evidence examined to raise a doubt as to the merits of the case. The examining board at Mount Vernon, Mo., report, December 22, 1883, that there is a direct hernia of left side.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, the title of the bill was amended so as to read, "granting a pension to J. W. A. Bennett," and a like amendment was made in the name where it occurs in the body of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS S. OWENS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4579) granting an increase of pension to Thomas S. Owens.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Thomas S. Owens, late a private in Company A, First Nebraska Veteran Volunteers, to $24 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4579) granting an increase of pension to Thomas S. Owens, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted in Company A, First Nebraska Cavalry, November 17, 1862, and was discharged July 1, 1866. He applied for a pension January 23, 1880, alleging chronic diarrhea, and resulting epileptic fits, heart palpitation, and indigestion. This was allowed for chronic diarrhea, but the other diseases stated were not admitted as results of chronic diarrhea. There seems to have been a difference of opinion in the board of medical referees on this question.

Dr. T. B. Hood says:

"I claim that the irritation of the mucous membrane of the bowels from chronic diarrhea would be a good and sufficient cause to produce the epileptic convulsions with the resulting functional disease of heart and indigestion."

The claimant is unable to work and is penniless, being helped by the county to support his wife and five children. He served nearly four years, and when good medical authority holds that the diseases for which he claims pension can properly be said to be the result of the disease admitted to have been contracted in the service, it would seem that the soldier ought to have the benefit of the doubt.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out all after the word "directed," in the fourth line, and inserting the words "to increase the pension of Thomas S. Owens, late a private in Company A, First Nebraska Veteran Volunteers, to $24 per month."

The amendments reported by the committee as set forth in the last paragraph of the report were agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

M. S. TOWNE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4370) granting a pension to M. S. Towne.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of M. S. Towne, late a private in Company H, One hundred and forty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4370) granting a pension to Myron S. Towne, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted August 16, 1862, as a private in Company H, One hundred and forty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, was promoted to lieutenant July 12, 1864, and was mustered out November 4, 1865. December, 1876, he filed application for pension, alleging piles and varicose veins, which was rejected October 28, 1885, on the ground of no record, and inability to prove incurrence in the service. His long service of over three years would seem to render any proof of prior soundness unnecessary, but claimant has shown by nine witnesses, all of whom are reported as of good reputation, that he was sound and well at time of enlistment and for nearly two years thereafter. Claimant testifies that he contracted varicose veins in the campaign of the Wilderness, and that they were much increased by subsequent service; that he can not furnish the evidence of a commissioned officer, as his company lost their officers, and the first sergeant was taken prisoner; that he can not furnish the testimony of the surgeon, as he never went to the hospital. He does, however, prove by medical evidence that he was treated immediately after discharge, and until 1883, by four different physicians, whose reputations are vouched for as good; that the piles resulted in fistula, for which surgical operations were performed in 1877 and again in 1879.

The board of medical examiners at Princeton, Mo., July 22, 1885, report him one-half disabled. There seems but one thing lacking in this case, and that is evidence of actual incurrence in the service. It is shown conclusively that he was free from the disease at enlistment and for nearly two years thereafter; that he was suffering from the disabilities at time of discharge, and that they have continued ever since. Diseases of this character are of slow development. At first the inconvenience and suffering from them is slight, and does not disable the soldier from the discharge of his duties. They might naturally have existed for weeks and months without requiring medical attendance. After a careful examination of the case your committee conclude that it is a proper one for Congress to afford the asked-for relief, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. B. ALFERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3945) for the relief of Mrs. B. Alfers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Mrs. B. Alfers (his mother) the pension allowed to James R., minor child of Antoine Brentano, late a sergeant of Company B., Thirteenth Kansas Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3945) for the relief of Mrs. B. Alfers, submit the following report:

We find that claimant is the mother of James R. Brentano, minor child of Antoine Brentano, late a sergeant of Company B, Thirteenth Kansas Volunteers. Antoine Brentano enlisted in Company B, Thirteenth Kansas Volunteers, September 1, 1862, and was discharged June 26, 1865. He died January 22, 1869. His widow, now Mrs. B. Alfers, remarried February 4, 1871, without having made any application for a pension. In 1881 an application was made for a pension for James R. Brentano, the only child (and a minor) of James R. Brentano. The evidence being satisfactory that the death of the soldier was the result of disabilities contracted in the service the pension was allowed and a certificate was issued for a pension to cease December 22, 1882, the date at which the minor arrived at the age of sixteen years. A few months before the certificate was issued James R. Brentano met with an accident which resulted in his death.

This bill asks that the pension allowed to the minor be paid to his mother, who is his sole heir. This would seem to be but simple justice. The papers in the case show that the evidence was filed some time before the death of the child, and had prompt action been taken in the Department the money would have been paid before his death, and in that event the mother would have received the benefit of it. A pension to a minor is for his support and education. This mother had kindly provided for all his wants, and had been to the expense of supporting and educating him till his sudden death deprived her of her child. Technically she is not entitled to the pension, but every principle of justice and equity demands that it should be paid to her.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALBERT L. ALLEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3530) granting a pension to Albert L. Allen.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Albert L. Allen, who was wounded while serving as a special agent of the Quartermaster's Office.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the report in that case. It appears to have something to do with the Quartermaster's Office.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3530) granting a pension to Albert L. Allen, submit the following report:

The evidence on file in this case shows the following facts: That during the war claimant was a Government agent, under the direction of Lyne S. Metcalfe, then in charge of Government stores at the Saint Louis depot; that he was ordered to and took charge of the quartermaster's stores, then embarked on the Government transport steamer Venice, and conducted the same from Saint Louis to Johnsonville, on the Tennessee River, in Tennessee; that while returning from said duty, having taken on board at Johnsonville a detachment of troops commanded by one Lieutenant Gibson, of the New Jersey troops, as they were approaching Paris, Tenn., on October 30, 1864, the Venice and consort were fired into by confederate troops under General Forrest; that Lieutenant Gibson ordered every man on board to fight till all should be killed, and enforced his order with drawn revolver; that all took arms and fought from 10 a. m. to 4 p. m., nine men being killed and many wounded; that claimant fought with a musket and was shot through the right shoulder and right foot, and was permanently disabled. The vessels were captured and most of the wounded carried off as prisoners, but the surgeon said that claimant would die and could not be removed, whereupon General Forrest paroled him. Claimant was neglected for five days, and lay helpless, with his wounds undressed, until they became offensive, and he has been disabled ever since.

The case was rejected by the Pension Department on the ground that claimant was not an enlisted man. Congress has repeatedly granted relief in similar cases by special act, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARTHA A. SILKEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4101) for the relief of Martha A. Silkey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Martha A. Silkey, widow of William Silkey, deceased, late a private in Company B, Sixty-fifth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, who, with his company, was captured by a portion of the command of the rebel General Sterling Price, at Carrollton, Mo., October 17, 1864, and he, with five others of the command so captured, was shot and killed by said rebel forces in retaliation, as it was claimed, for the killing of two rebel soldiers by a squad of the same command to which said Silkey belonged, said Silkey at the time being in the service of the United States, at the time of his capture engaged in the defense of a Federal military post at Carrollton aforesaid; and her claim for a pension, No. 177193, having been rejected by the Pension Department for reasons stated in the opinion of the Commissioner; said pension to be subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4101) granting a pension to Martha A. Silkey, submit the following report:

We find that Martha A. Silkey is the widow of William Silkey, private of Company B, Sixty-fifth Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia. Briefly stated, the evidence is as follows: This soldier was captured, with his company, October 17, 1864, by a portion of the command under the rebel General Sterling Price, and while a prisoner was shot, as it was claimed, in retaliation for the killing of two rebel soldiers by a squad of the same command to which Silkey belonged. His widow filed a claim for pension July 6, 1869. As the soldier belonged to one of the classes of organizations specified in the third paragraph of section 4693, Revised Statutes, the claim was not valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to July 4, 1874. This was not entirely done, though the material portion of the evidence was filed before 1871.

It would seem that there can be no question as to the duty of Congress in this case, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with the amendment striking out that portion after the word "militia," in seventh line, and before the word "subject," in the twentieth line.

The committee recommended the amendment of the bill by striking out all after the word "militia," in the seventh line.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET CALLANAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4134) for the relief of Margaret Callanan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Callanan, of Orange, in the county of Essex, in the State of New Jersey, widow of Eugene Callahan, late a private in Company F, of the Second Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month, and the allowance provided for minor children under sixteen years of age, from and after the 18th day of March, A. D. 1864, the date of the death of her said husband.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4134) for the relief of Margaret Callanan, submit the following report:

The claimant asks pension on account of the death of her husband, who was a private in Company F, Second Regiment New Jersey Volunteers.

The Pension Office rejected the claim on the ground that the disease of which he died did not originate in the service and line of duty.

The soldier obtained a furlough February 10, 1864, for thirty-five days, and while at home, March 18, 1864, died of typhoid pneumonia.

The claimant can furnish no evidence as to origin of the disease, but states that the soldier on his arrival home had a bad cough and was feeling unwell.

Dr. Lyman M. Crane testifies that he was first called to visit soldier March 12, 1864, and found him very ill with inflammation of the lungs. He had been complaining from the time he got his furlough, and had a bad cough, till he was taken down to his bed the day before the doctor was called to see him. In answer to question put in affidavit, "Is it possible that he could have contracted such disease subsequent to February 10, 1864," he says:

"I think not. His disease assumed a typhoid form very different from any inflammatory disease prevalent in this latitude at the time. In my opinion he contracted the disease of which he died from exposure and fatigue in the United States Army previous to getting his furlough. The United States hospital physician at Newark, N. J., requested me to make affidavit to his condition and send it on, which I did accordingly."

The doctor's conclusion seems positive; and your committee are of the opinion that this is a deserving claim, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, does that bill carry arrearages back to 1864?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the bill to be read again, so that the gentleman may judge for himself.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that bill by striking out "eight," before the word "dollars," and inserting the word "twelve."

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I shall object to that. I prefer to have the pension granted subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws. Then if the widows' pension bill does not become a law this lady will get the same as any other widow, and that is all she ought to have.

Mr. GIBSON. I understand, then, that the amendment is withdrawn. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to offer another amendment. I move to strike out all after that portion of the bill completing the fact of putting this widow upon the pension-roll subject to the pension laws, and I will ask the Clerk to read the bill so amended, in order that we may hear how it reads.

The Clerk read the bill as above printed down to and including the words "New Jersey Volunteers," in the eighth line.

Mr. GIBSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, in connection with my amendment I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the bill in its present form presents another instance where it is sought to take a particular case out of its general class. The bill in its present form would carry the arrearages back in this one case, although we have refused to do that in thousands of other cases.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] will allow me to state that when the committee agreed to report this bill they instructed the gentleman who was to make the report to report it with such an amendment as the gentleman from West Virginia now proposes, but through some misunderstanding the amendment was not reported with the bill.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Well, if there is a mistake, let that portion of the bill be stricken out, and there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRADY. Will this affect the question of granting pensions to the children?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. The general law provides for pensions to the children under a certain age. There is no necessity for specifying the children in the bill.

Mr. LOVERING. There seems to be a discrepancy in regard to the name, which in one place is "Callahan" and in another "Callanan."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman who introduced the bill has already advised the Chair that the name is properly "Callanan," and unless there be objection the bill be amended so that the name will read in that way wherever it occurs.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from West Virginia to strike out all after the word "volunteers," in line 8.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN D. JAMES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3753) granting a pension to John D. James.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John D. James, late a private in Company H, Third Regiment Pennsylvania Artillery Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3753) granting a pension to John D. James, submit the following report;

John D. James, late private Company H, Third Regiment, Pennsylvania Artillery, filed his application for pension March 29, 1882, alleging disability from spinal wound received at Baltimore pike, Maryland, June 30, 1863, caused by his horse falling and by such fall the hammer of his revolver penetrated his spine and caused injury. The application was rejected May 23, 1885, on the ground that there was no record of alleged injury. The claimant proved that prior to the time of enlistment he was in good sound health and was free from injury to spine.

The reports from Surgeon-General show that he entered Sutterlie General Hospital, West Philadelphia, Pa., July 5, 1863, with rheumatism, the case-book showing debility, headache, and considerable pains in side and limbs, and after being transferred from one hospital to another was returned to duty December 7, 1863, being discharged from Convalescent Camp, Virginia, January 16, 1864, upon certificate of disability. The reports from Adjutant-General show that claimant enlisted in said company October 31, 1862, and the rolls for July and August report him absent, sick in United States general hospital at Chester, Pa., to December 31, 1863, January and February, 1864, and discharged for disability at Washington, D. C., January 16, 1864, the nature of illness not stated, and the regimental hospital records not on file.

Dr. F. J. Bancroft, the surgeon of the regiment, testifies that claimant was a sound man prior to his enlistment; that he knew him before his enlistment into the service, and examined him at the time of his enlistment, and found no weakness of the spine existed at that time. He further says that he believes he treated him for injury to spine during term of service. Claimant expressed his inability to furnish the testimony of the officers or comrades of his company, because he has never been able to ascertain their whereabouts; that the captain, he has been informed, is dead, and his comrades so scattered about that it is impossible to find them; that one is in Germany, but though having written him repeatedly has never heard from him.

It is shown that since his discharge claimant has been a constant sufferer from spinal derangement and unable to perform anything but light labor, and laid up with illness resulting from derangement of the spine a considerable part of the time, and in the enjoyment of very poor health, and incapacitated for even light labor fully one-half the time. The medical evidence filed shows frequent treatment since discharge for spinal derangement, and the examining surgeon, in reporting claimant two-thirds incapacitated for manual labor, says:

"I find there has been an injury at about the eleventh dorsal vertebra, and quite tender for about 6 inches, and remember him being in county hospital for several months in 1878 with trouble in his back. He says he is not able to lift a pail of water without causing pain in the back."

Your committee believe this to be a deserving case, and though claimant has been unable to prove it, from the evidence presented and hospital records are of the opinion that the injury to spine was contracted, as alleged, in the service and line of duty, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM DERMODY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1505) granting a pension to William Dermody.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Dermody, late a private in Company E, Fifth Regiment New Jersey Infantry, and in Company H, Seventh Regiment New Jersey Infantry, at the rate of $8 per month, to date from the 23d day of July, 1865.

Mr. WINANS. I move to amend this bill by striking out the clause which carries arrearages. I think the instructions of the House committee to the gentleman who reported the bill provided for this amendment, and it was omitted by inadvertence. I remember distinctly such was the instruction of the committee.

Mr. MATSON. That is the fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WINANS].

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill strike out the words "at the rate of $8 per month, to date from the 23d day of July, 1865."

Mr. BUCHANAN. This bill was introduced by myself; and if there ever was a case in which arrears ought to be granted, this is one. The man was wounded within 50 yards of camp on his return to duty from a visit to his home. The case was rejected by the Pension Office, and, on appeal, by the Secretary of the Interior, on the ground that the man did not receive his injury in the line of duty. There is no question about the receipt of the injury; there is no question that the man was in the service at the time the injury was received. If it be the settled policy of the committee and of the House to grant no arrears in any case, I shall not oppose the amendment; but such a rule applied to this case certainly works gross hardship to a faithful soldier. The application was rejected at the Pension Office on the merest technicality.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Did this man file his claim soon enough to come in under the arrearage act?

Mr. BUCHANAN. He did.

Mr. WOLFORD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly.

Mr. WOLFORD. Was the application in this case filed at the Pension Office in season to have entitled the applicant to arrears if the pension had been granted?

Mr. BUCHANAN. As I have just stated in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, it was. There is no trouble on that score.

Mr. LOUTTIT. Can the gentleman state the precise date of the filing of the application?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I can not give the exact date; but I know it was filed within the time. I repeat, however, that if it is the settled policy to grant no arrears in any case I shall not oppose the amendment; but if there ever was a case where arrears ought to be granted this is undoubtedly such a case.

Several MEMBERS. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1505) granting a pension to William Dermody, submit the following report:

The claimant was a private in Company H, Seventh Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, and in his application for pension alleged disability from gunshot wound of the right thigh, received at Trenton Barracks, Trenton, N. J., July 26, 1865, from the hands of one of the Invalid Corps, who was whipping a drummer boy, while claimant attempted to stop him.

The officers of the regiment testify that the regiment was mustered out of service at Washington, D. C., and had arrived at Trenton, N. J., for final discharge; and also that claimant was wounded in the right thigh by one of the Invalid Corps on the date mentioned, as alleged. William Ramage, captain of Company D, of same regiment, testifies as being an eye-witness to wounding, and to picking claimant up and sending him to his home in a wagon.

Sylvester W. Nafew, the captain of claimant's company, testifies that about July 22, 1865, the regiment arrived in Trenton, N. J., for being paid off and discharged, and on the afternoon of their arrival he gave claimant permission to spend the night with his family in said city, to report at 9 a. m. the next day; that next morning at about said hour claimant returned to the United States barracks, near said city, where they were quartered, and just as he was about entering camp he saw a drunken soldier of the Invalid Corps beating and kicking a little drummer boy named William Murphy, of the Sixth New Jersey, in the public road, and thereby greatly endangering the limbs and life of said boy; that said claimant rushed to the rescue of said boy, when said drunken soldier drew a revolver and shot claimant in the right thigh, wounding him severely; that claimant was put in a wagon and sent to his own home and there treated for said disability, affiant thinks, by the surgeon or assistant surgeon of the regiment; that claimant was a good soldier and not addicted to intemperance or other bad habits, and that when disabled as aforesaid he was still in service and in the line of his duty.

Dr. Richard R. Rogers testifies that about July 21, 1865, he was called to attend the claimant for a gunshot wound of right leg, for which attended him about one week.

The application for pension was rejected on the ground that the wounds were not received in the line of duty.

The Pension Office, your committee think, were in error in their decision in this case, because the soldier had permission to leave camp, and was on his return and almost if not quite in camp, and therefore should be considered in the line of his duty, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. WOLFORD. In my humble opinion, if there ever was a case in which justice, humanity, and a proper regard for the honor of the country demanded that the soldier should receive arrears of pension, this is such a case. The decision given at the Pension Office in this case, under which this application was there rejected, has now, as I understand, been reversed. The decision was to the effect that a soldier having been on leave of absence and returning to his command—doing the very thing that he agreed to do—is not a soldier in the line of his duty. There is no evidence in this case that the soldier did not return at the time appointed. There is no evidence that he did not do everything which a true and faithful soldier ought to do. At the time he received this injury he was simply obeying the highest impulse of humanity and manhood. Finding a drunken soldier chastising unmercifully a boy, he interposed, as any one with the instincts of a man ought to have done; and because he thus interposed he was shot and wounded. Being thus disabled for life, his health ruined in the cause of his country, when he was exercising the highest and noblest impulse of human nature, he goes to the Pension Office for a pension, and is told upon a technicality that he was not strictly in the line of duty. Surely in such a ruling there is no latitude allowed in construing the term "line of duty." Surely it is a very short and circumscribed "line of duty" that does not take in such circumstances as those surrounding this case.

Having been rejected at the Pension Office, the man now comes to the Congress of the United States. I will venture the assertion that there is no man in this House to-night who will not say, speaking honestly from his heart, that this man ought to have had a pension granted by the Department. It is no fault of his that he did not get it there.

There is no act of limitation passed by Congress that would have debarred him—for I inquired into that particularly—from his pension if he had received one dollar. But they say you can not do it here. Why not?

Mr. MORRILL. I understood you a moment ago to say that the decision had been reversed at the Pension Office.

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes; I understood that it had been reversed at the Pension Office.

Mr. MORRILL. Then why not take it back to the Pension Office?

Mr. WOLFORD. Because it is here now and before you gentlemen of Congress who ought to dispose of it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky for the remarks he is making in behalf of this soldier. If he will permit me, I would state that as I understand the subsequent decision of the Pension Office it does not affect this particular class of cases. I have thought that perhaps it would be well again to ask the Secretary to take up this case, but on reading that subsequent ruling I became satisfied it did not reach this case at all.

Now the Commissioner has had it before him twice, and the decision has been that this man was not wounded in the line of duty. According to my idea the soldier is in the line of duty from the moment he is recruited until he is discharged, unless when he is trying to desert.

Mr. WOLFORD. I ask the attention of the gentlemen present for a few moments only. Surely the Congress of the United States is not to act in such way as to deprive a man of his rights. Surely no ruling can be accepted which will operate so as to prevent men from doing their duty Now the country promised this man when he went into the Army that if he was injured while in the Army he should be provided for. If he was wounded the law said that he should be pensioned. If he were killed it provided that his widow and children should be pensioned. Upon the faith of that pledge these brave soldiers went into the Army and risked everything for the country. They went into battle and took the chances of wounds and death. They confronted all the consequences which might come upon them. Now can we, who are enjoying the blessings of the peace which followed the war, a peace brought about by the noble exertions of these men, forget our pledges and our promises, made not only by implication but by express enactment of law? Can we answer those promises by saying, "No, my son; it is true you did your duty; it is true you did it nobly; it is true you did everything that ought to have been done; it is true you have shown yourself to be a man; when the drunken soldier was chastising a boy you interfered and were ruined—that may all be true, but because of a mere technicality of the Pension Office you are deprived of your right to the pension which the law promised you."

But this case is not now before the Pension Office. It is not where a technicality can strike down this man's rights. It is here where it ought to be, before the Congress of the United States, which represents the great people that said to that man, "You shall be vindicated; you shall be made whole; you shall as far as this Government goes in its benignity be sustained; you shall have compensation for the lack of strength, for the lack of manhood, for being crippled; you shall be compensated for that."

Are we to be told that the Congress of the United States is to stand back and say, "I can not do this?" Why can not you do it? I appeal to you gentlemen by every consideration of reason, of equity, of law, why can not we do it? Why should we not do justice to this man? Why not do justice to the citizen who believed in your promises when he went out to fight in behalf of his country?

It is said there are cases where heretofore we have refused arrears. Yes, gentlemen, that is so; but when you did it you did wrong. For I assert here now there is no principle by which discrimination can be made between an act passed by Congress and a decision by a commissioner appointed by act of Congress. The Commissioner of Pensions is nothing more than your agent to carry out the law which you enacted. You can not tell me that he can give arrears of pension and yet that you can not do the same thing yourselves by passing an act for that purpose. To say that this Congress can not do what it has provided by law that its agent can do is not founded upon any principle of law or equity. It is all wrong.

Now, I asserted in the last Congress, and I repeat it here to-night, that every time this Congress refuses to pension a wounded soldier from the time he was wounded it fails to fulfill the promise which was made when all these soldiers were enlisted and went into the Army. Whenever Congress fails to carry the pension back to the time the soldier was wounded it fails to meet the pledges of the people. It is repudiation, and repudiation toward the very men who risked every thing to save the Union.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am loath to have the committee detained longer upon the consideration of this case——

Mr. WOLFORD. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The facts are laid before the committee, and while we are doing justice to this man, for God's sake do not let us forget those that are farther down on the list.

Mr. WOLFORD. I certainly have no desire to detain the committee, I only wanted to present my views, and having done so I now yield the floor.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Do I understand that the gentleman from New Jersey accepts the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WINANS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, if I understand this bill correctly the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan would leave it somewhat imperfect in form, unless it carried the additional clause providing that the pension shall be granted under the provisions and limitations of the pension law.

Mr. WINANS. That will be the effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill as it will read if amended.

The bill was again read as proposed to be amended.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me take a moment to state that the reason the rate was fixed in the bill is this: because of the injury to this man's limb, which left it in a crippled condition, he received a second injury, which resulted in the amputation of the limb. There is abundant testimony to show that the subsequent injury was the result of the lack of the free use of the crippled limb; and I doubt very much whether any board of surgeons would be able to rate him or decide properly upon the merits of the case in the absence of the crippled limb.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Let me ask if the purpose is to fix the rate——

Mr. BUCHANAN. The man is on crutches now, and has been for fifteen years, to my certain knowledge.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. The object is, as I understand it, to fix the rate at $8 a month rather than have an examination and a rating by a board of surgeons, on account of the absence of the limb?

Mr. BUCHANAN. On account of the absence of anything to examine, we would, of course, rather have the higher rate, $25; but, as I have said, there is a difficulty in the way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand the gentleman from New Jersey to accept the amendment?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not know what the gentleman understands. I do not accept the amendment unless, by the votes of gentlemen present, I am required to do so.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to say, then, that I am in favor of all the pension propositions that have come before us to-night; but I think it will be very unwise to depart from a well-established precedent and allow arrears in any case like this.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, if there is any question about breaking the well-established precedents in regard to this class of legislation I must object, and ask leave of the committee to say a word or two, and hope the committee will bear with me in view of the fact that I have never up to this time—the third session of my service in Congress—made any factious opposition to the passage of any pension bill. But we have duties which we must perform toward our constituents who are not soldiers as well as to our constituents who have been soldiers. That duty, Mr. Chairman, is to guard not only the public Treasury, but to observe the laws as they are fixed upon the statute-books, and the pledges that we have made to our constituents to that extent; to do right between the pensioners too, as well as to make the law our rule of action to apply to all alike. Now, here is a case, let gentlemen say what they please about it, that is not only not doubtful as to its status, but it does not even come within the settled principle of the law which we have made applicable to all other soldiers throughout the country. Here is a case that can not pass a person through the office of the Commissioner of Pensions. Here is a case that the party does not dare to appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, or if it was appealed to him who is made the tribunal of appeal in such cases, was there rejected because it does not come within the general law. Now they come forward and not only ask Congress to disregard the judicial action of the officers created by law to pass upon the case, but they ask us to disregard all the settled precedents of the House and the established law, and say to this man whose case has been rejected by an officer created by law to pass upon it that he must not only be put upon the pension-roll, but shall have special privileges in his case which have been granted to no other soldier in this land. I ask gentlemen if they expect to establish such a precedent here? They must know the result will be to create opposition to this system of pensions and break down thousands of worthy claims while fighting over these unworthy ones.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BRADY. I desire to vote understandingly on the question, and I would like some information from the gentleman from New Jersey. This man, as I understand, was not a soldier at the time. He had been mustered out of the service.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Not at all. He had not yet received his discharge, for the discharges of that regiment I personally know were delivered to that regiment at Trenton.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. It appears from the report that the regiment was mustered out of service at Washington and had been ordered to Trenton to receive their final discharge. I say that in a case of that sort things should not be pushed too for.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will say that the Pension Office, which is in the habit of raising every technical objection it can, never made that objection.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AMANDA HOUSELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3546) granting a pension to Amanda Housell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amanda Housell (together with her minor children), widow of John M. Housell, late a private in Company K, First Regiment Maryland Infantry Volunteers, to date from September 1, 1865.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions with the following amendment:

At the end of the bill strike out the words "to date from September 1, 1865."

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3546) granting a pension to Amanda Housell, submit the following report:

It appears from the testimony in this case that John M. Housell, the husband of claimant, enlisted August 13, 1861, in Company C, Fourth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, and was discharged October 29, 1862, upon a surgeon's certificate of disability because of "chronic diarrhea, which resists all treatment; sick six months." He re-enlisted June 20, 1864, in Company E, Eighth Regiment Maryland Volunteers, and was transferred to Company K, First Regiment Maryland Volunteers, and was mustered out August 1, 1865, at Washington, D. C., upon individual muster-out roll, as from general hospital, Alexandria, Va. The records of Lickle Hospital, Virginia, show that he was discharged from the service August 4, 1865, and was paid in full on same date at Washington, D. C., since which date his whereabouts have been unknown.

The claimant, believing her husband to be dead, filed a claim for pension as widow April 9, 1881, and the claim was rejected on the ground "that there is no record at the War Department of the date and cause of death of soldier, and the claimant has declared her inability to prove the same."

In transmitting the case to the honorable Secretary of the Interior on an appeal of the case by the claimant's attorney, the Commissioner of Pensions uses the following language:

"Whether his death was actually caused by the disease contracted in the service, or by events not due to his service, is a question that can not be determined by the facts before us.

"The Commissioner has no authority under the law to presume a result; he must decide questions on the facts presented, and in this instance it is clear that the soldier's death can not be definitely charged to the service. The case seems to be worthy of consideration by Congress with a view to special legislation to give title."

The Secretary of the Interior sustained the action of the Commissioner of Pensions in rejecting the claim, and in his opinion uses the following language:

"The presumption that the soldier is dead is very great, and the presumption that he died from chronic diarrhea and shortly after discharge is also great. The Department concurs in the opinion expressed in your report, quoted above, that you have no authority under the law to grant a pension in this case; and further the Department concurs with you in the opinion that the case seems worthy of special legislation."

The testimony in this case shows that the soldier prior to his first enlistment was in good sound health and free from disease of chronic diarrhea, and that said disease was contracted in the service, and at the time of his discharge had assumed a malignant form, and bears out the opinion of the honorable Secretary of the Interior that he died shortly after discharge from said disease.

Your committee deem this a meritorious case, and recommend the passage of the bill with the amendment, striking out after word "Volunteers," line 8, the words "to date from September first, eighteen hundred and sixty-five."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN W. ROSE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1504) granting a pension to John W. Rose.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In this case I feel bound to say there is an adverse report. The bill was reported without my knowledge and I would like it to be passed over informally, without losing its place on the Calendar, until I can procure additional testimony.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RICHARD GEAR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3921) granting a pension to Richard Gear.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Richard Gear, late a private in Company G, Twentieth Iowa Volunteers, at the rate of $72 per month, in lieu of the pension heretofore allowed him, as specified in pension certificate 275893.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3921) having given the same due consideration, beg leave to report:

That Richard Gear, late a private in Company G, Twentieth Iowa Volunteers, is now drawing a pension of $21 per month for disease of the eyes, said disability being the result of fever, with which the claimant suffered about July 3, 1863, while in the service. About September, 1884, he became totally blind and applied for an increase of his pension in consequence. His application was rejected, for the reason that "loss of vision did not result from the disease of eyes for which pension was granted." This decision was based upon an examination and report of an oculist, Dr. F. E. Cruttenden, made January 5, 1885, from which we extract the following objective symptoms:

"Slight ophthalmia; no fixation; a little conjunctivitis; no evidence of severe inflammation or granulation of lids; no adhesion of iris; pupils widely dilated; refracting media clear and a little myopic; retina and choroid show no evidence of any inflammatory trouble; vascular supply reduced one-half; disk depressed; grayish white atrophy; depression does not indicate chronic or absolute glaucoma; vision apparently nothing; says he can not see light; slight degree strabismus, divergent. I think he is afflicted with ataxia, and that his loss of vision is a direct result. Whether the ataxia was acquired after or before he left the service I am unable to decide."

The proof upon which his present pension was granted, which was abundant and clear, was that while on guard duty soon after recovery from a severe fever he became suddenly blind, and had to be led to camp, his vision being ever after impaired, and his eyes more or less inflamed, and so continuing, part of the time troubling but little, and at other times very seriously.

Two previous medical examinations find:

Chronic granulations of both lids, and decided opacity of pupil.

A third, by a full board, says:

"The lids are granulated, and indicate chronicity. The eyes are blear. There is congestion of the conjunctiva of the ball and photophobia."

The Pension Office, taking the opinion of the oculist, Dr. Cruttenden, that the loss of vision was the result of ataxia, reject the claim because "ataxia was not alleged or proven to have been incurred in the service."

It does not seem probable that the claimant would know or allege that ataxia was a result of the fever, but he does know and allege that his present disease of eyes is the result of the said fever; and it seems from a comparison of the diagnoses furnished by the three medical examinations with that of the oculist, and the fact that the symptoms attending the first disability in the service were the same as when total blindness resulted, that the ataxia was the result of the fever, and the total blindness was the result of the ataxia.

Luther Gear testifies:

"I have lived near him and been with him since 1865 to this date (December 15, 1883), and his eyes have been growing worse all the time. I have nearly every year since, or some one else has, had to help him put in his crops. At times during the whole time since 1865 he has been laid up with his eyes, and in the last six months his eyes have failed very much. He can hardly see to walk around now, and not able to do any work."

Dr. M. D. Sloan testifies, May 21, 1885:

"About six months ago I made an examination of claimant at his request and found him to be totally blind in both eyes from chronic glaucoma, the pupils widely dilated and immovable, the eyeballs prominent, and the tension increased to T + 2. His nervous system seemed to be in a very irritable condition."

From all the testimony in this case, both lay and medical, it is quite apparent that the same affliction which caused the disability in the service has continued to this date and has gradually resulted in total blindness, and if he was entitled to the pension for partial disability he is clearly entitled to the increase when the increase of that disability has made him totally helpless, and should not be withheld for the reason that claimant did not use the scientific and technical name in alleging his original disability.

The proof shows that the soldier is not only blind, but utterly helpless, in abject poverty, and rapidly failing health.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. That report is so perfectly clear and presents so beautiful an opportunity for discussion for the committee, that I think they would not be doing themselves justice to let the bill pass without some discussion.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say, with reference to this case, that the only reason why this soldier was not granted a pension at the Pension Office was simply because he did not allege in his application for pension the scientific or technical name for the disease for which he sought a pension. The nature of his disease is now stated in the terms of the report of the expert oculist who examined him. The soldier in the first place made an application for a pension for inflammation of the eyes and was granted only $2 per month.

On his application for an increase of pension he was sent to an expert oculist, who says he has gone blind from ataxia, which is a brain disease, and consequently the disability, the inflammation of the eyes, for which he was given his first pension, was not the disease which made him totally blind. But the symptoms which he first discovered were the same as the symptoms of the disease which finally made him blind, as the testimony shows; but because he did not call the disease with which he was afflicted ataxia the Pension Department failed to give him a certificate. He is now totally blind, and of course should have $72 a month, the same as totally blind soldiers receive.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to inquire in this case whether the Pension Committee have adopted any new rule or changed the rule which I supposed prevailed invariably in granting pensions; that is, to leave the rating of pensions wholly to the medical board?

Mr. CONGER. The rate for one totally blind is fixed at $72 per month.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The rate is fixed for the disability of total blindness, and that, it seems to me, is only a matter of fact, which the Pension board can easily determine.

Mr. CONGER. The Pension board have determined the fact that he is blind; but, on the report of the expert oculist, they say that the disease which finally made him blind was not the disease contracted in the service. It has been proven conclusively to your committee that the same disease that he incurred in the service has made him blind.

Mr. McMILLIN. If blindness is not the result of his services, how is it that he received a pension at all?

Mr. CONGER. It is the result of his service.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then why can not the Department rate him?

Mr. CONGER. For this reason—I quote from the decision on which his claim for an increase was rejected—that "loss of vision did not result from the disease of the eyes for which pension was granted." Now the expert oculist says he has finally gone blind as the result of ataxia, which is a disease of the brain; and he had been on the pension-roll for alleged disability which, when making his first application for a pension, he called inflammation of the eyes, but the symptom was the same when he was first attacked as when he went blind.

Mr. McMILLIN. If blindness was not the result of injury contracted in the service, but the result of brain troubles, it seems to me the decision is correct.

Mr. CONGER. But the brain trouble commenced in the service when the soldier became suddenly blind after a severe attack of typhoid fever. He recovered somewhat from that attack, but the blindness subsequently returned and grew worse.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, there is no question that if this soldier is totally blind, and has become so in consequence of his military service, he is entitled to $72 a month under the law as it now exists. As I understand the case, then, it is simply a question of fact whether his total blindness was the result of his military service or not. There does not appear to be any question as to the fact of the blindness. The only point about which there can be any question is the cause of the blindness. Now, is there any disagreement upon that point between the medical board and the outside testimony?

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; there is no difference except in the manner in which the oculist presents the case. His diagnosis of the case is just the same as that of the other doctors.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But there is no question or difference between them as to the fact of total blindness?

Mr. CONGER. None at all.

Mr. ELLSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, there is no difference of opinion upon the part of the medical board in relation to this case. The difficulty resulted merely from a mistake on the part of the applicant in presenting his case. He had had a severe attack of typhoid fever which depressed his whole nervous system, and, as a natural sequence of such an attack, any organ may become involved.

In this case it produced inflammation of the eye. That inflammation existed at the time of the application. The claimant did not know that there was anything but simple inflammation, but there was conjunctival inflammation, which resulted in inflammation of the cornea. The brain trouble undoubtedly resulted from the depressed condition of his nervous system consequent upon typhoid fever, producing this ataxia and ophthalmia. The sequence of the pathological condition is clear and can not be denied, and had the applicant given a proper definition of his case at the beginning or had he had when he was making his application a physician who understood his business there never would have been any dispute whatever about the case.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AARON C. JOHNSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4905) granting a pension to Aaron C. Johnson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Aaron C. Johnson, late lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and seventy-eighth Ohio Volunteers, and now a resident of Linden, Dallas County, Iowa.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 4905, having given the same due consideration, report:

That Aaron C. Johnson entered the service June 8, 1861, as captain Twelfth Independent Ohio Battery, served through the entire war, being mustered out at the close as lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and seventy-eighth Ohio Infantry. He filed his application for pension January 31, 1884, alleging that while in the line of duty, from exposure at Murfreesborough, Tenn., during the winter of 1864 and 1865, he contracted chronic diarrhea and heart disease, which still continues. This was rejected for chronic diarrhea because it was not troubling him at the time of medical examination, and for heart disease because it was due to rheumatism prior to enlistment.

This rejection seems to have been based entirely upon the following medical examination:

"Chronic diarrhea;" says he has none now. "Disease of heart;" says he had metastatic rheumatism about thirty years ago, and that while in the service, riding on a march, he began to have short breathing and trouble with his heart. We find an extremely irregular heart-beat, intermittent, with unusually well-marked mitral regurgitation. He is in his present condition totally disabled for manual labor. While the disability may not have developed until after he was exposed in the service, the probability is that the rheumatism, occurring prior to his entering the service, was the cause of his heart disease.

But, contra, we have Dr. Taylor, the assistant surgeon of claimant's regiment, who swore that claimant contracted chronic diarrhea in the service, and that he treated him for the same. And Dr. Harlow, of Washington Court-House, Ohio, who testifies that he has known him intimately for twenty-five years; that he was sound and healthy when he enlisted; that he returned from the war with chronic diarrhea and heart trouble, and that he treated him for the same at various times, until about 1880 claimant moved to Iowa.

Dr. H. C. Coffman, of same place, also testifies:

"I was acquainted with Dr. A. C. Johnson before, during, and after the war. I was his family physician several years preceding the rebellion. I was well acquainted with him at the time of his enlistment, and know him to have been a sound and healthy man. After his return home at the close of the war I prescribed for him frequently for chronic diarrhea every summer while he remained in the vicinity. He also was complaining at the same time with heart trouble, such as palpitation and a smothering sensation. For heart I gave him no treatment as I now remember."

O. A. Allen, M. D., Washington Court House, Ohio, testifies practically the same, and that he examined him for life insurance in 1865 or 1866, and that on his report the company rejected him.

Dr. I. D. Payne, Linden, Iowa, testifies:

"Have known claimant since September, 1880, having been his attending physician. Have treated him at different times for chronic diseases that I have reason to believe date back many years prior to my first treatment. Find him afflicted with mitral lesions of the heart-valves, chronic, also has chronic dysentery, condition existing at the time of my first acquaintance with him. Has been much of the time, on account of chronic dysentery, confined to his bed and room, and never being free from relapses of the disease but a short time at once. There has been a gradual decline in his health, on account of above diseases, since my first treatment and knowledge of his case in September, 1880."

With such an array of testimony as to prior soundness and constant and continued disability since, and in view of his four full years of arduous service, it seems hardly fair to fix upon a single attack of rheumatism of thirty years ago as the prime cause of his disability.

Your committee believe him clearly entitled to a place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHRISTIAN SMARZO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4903) granting a pension to Christian Smarzo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Christian Smarzo, employé at the Quartermaster's Department, United States Army.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to hear the report in that case.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4903) granting a pension to Christian Smarzo, having given the same careful consideration, report:

That Christian Smarzo was an employé in the Quartermaster's Department, United States Army, during the war of the rebellion, and that while so employed as a fireman on a locomotive engine, near Big Shanty, Ga., on the 25th of September, 1864, the train was attacked and captured by the enemy; claimant was wounded by a gunshot wound in left side, taken prisoner, held as such for three months, paroled, furloughed for three months, and then returned to same duty.

His application for pension was rejected on the ground that "he was not in the military service of the United States at the date of receipt of wound." It is true claimant was not enlisted and mustered into the service, but he was performing a most perilous yet meritorious service, one that required a very high order of courage and soldierly valor. He was wounded and taken prisoner while at his post of duty, and as richly deserves reward as does he who fought with gun or sword.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

H. W. M'DONALD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4490) granting a pension to H. W. McDonald.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of H. W. McDonald, late of Company A, Fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 4490, having considered the same, beg leave to report:

That the claimant, H. W. McDonald, enlisted as a private in Company A, Fifth Iowa Volunteers, July 15, 1861, and was discharged April 19, 1863. His application for pension was rejected on the ground "that disease of heart existed prior to enlistment." This theory seems to have been based entirely upon the statement in his certificate of disability for discharge: that he had "hypertrophy of the heart, of several years' standing, and had been unfit for duty most of the time since he enlisted."

Claimant furnishes testimony of six respectable witnesses, physician, neighbors, schoolmate, comrade, and lieutenant of his company, that he was perfectly sound and healthy prior to and at the time of enlistment.

The certificate on which he was discharged proves conclusively the existence of disease in service; continuance since is clearly proven by both medical and lay testimony.

Two special examiners were sent out by the Department and twenty-five witnesses examined. Many of them testify positively to prior soundness; "that at enlistment he was a boy of seventeen, robust, full of health and vigor." Some of them did not know his condition then, and only one—a doctor, who thought he had prescribed for him on account of heart disease in 1861—gave any testimony indicating existence of disease prior to enlistment.

Capt. William Dean, who signed his discharge with the statement as to prior existence of heart disease, testifies in examination by special examiner upon this point:

"Perhaps I was a little rough on him at that time. I did not know him prior to service. He had been appealing to me for a discharge, claiming heart disease. We expected active service at that time, and I wanted to get rid of this class of men, and I discharged him."

Without quoting further from the voluminous testimony, your committee are very strongly of the opinion that this explanation of Captain Dean, together with the fact that examinations were quite strict in those early days of the war, the extreme youth of the soldier, and his service of nearly two years before discharge, are amply sufficient to overcome the evidence of prior disease in his certificate of discharge, and to warrant the relief by Congress which the Pension Office, following the strict letter of the law, did not feel authorized to grant.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PERRY JOHNSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4813) granting a pension to Perry Johnson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to place the name of Perry Johnson on the pension-roll of the United States, at the rate of $72 per month, instead of the pension now allowed and paid him.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report in that case be read.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4813) granting a pension to Perry Johnson, submit the following report:

That Perry Johnson, late a private of Company C, Third Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, is now on the pension-roll at the rate of $50 per month, for total and permanent helplessness, the result of gunshot wound in left side, received at Pea Ridge, Ark., March 5, 1862. This rate of $50 per month was granted him March 1, 1881. He has since filed two applications asking an increase to $72 per month, both of which have been rejected on the ground that "he is now drawing the highest rate to which he is entitled by law."

The act of June 16, 1880, increasing the pension of those "utterly helpless" from $50 to $72 per month, was by its terms made applicable only to those persons then on the roll at $50. Therefore those who might be placed on the roll at that rate after that date could not receive the benefits thereof, no matter how serious their disability nor how deplorable their condition.

As to present condition of claimant, the proof is abundant and conclusive of his utter helplessness, continual suffering, and requiring the constant attention of another person; is confined to his bed all the time; can not turn in bed without help; has to take morphine constantly to allay pain; still carries ball in his body.

The last official medical examination ordered by the Commissioner of Pensions, April 5, 1885, says:

"Ball entered about near anterior superior spinous process of ilium on left side, taking its course backward and downward, leaving a well-defined cicatrix as big as a dime-piece, with a dark red discoloration of several inches around cicatrix; cicatrix very tender and discharging constantly thick pus. There is a hard and very tender tumor extending from cicatrix of point of entrance along iliac region and partly down over thigh, supposed to contain pus. Left testicle drawn up and tender. Anasarca of bowels. There is a cicatrix on inside of thigh about at junction of middle and upper one-third, also freely discharging pus, seemingly a sinus in connection with abscess above. There is a third cicatrix on back, about 2 inches to left of spinal column, near junction of lumbar and dorsal vertebra, constantly discharging. Contraction and adhesion of muscles about cicatrices in back and thigh. Tenderness over whole spinal column. Very emaciated. Left knee hypertrophied, partly anchylosed, tender, painful, and stiff. Right lung hepatized and entirely useless; left lung incipient hepatization; throat inflamed and ulcerated; difficulty about lungs superinduced likely by sepicæmia from extensive suppuration. This man has no prospect of recovery, and needs the attendance of another person constantly."

Your committee can see no good reason why this unfortunate man should not receive the same allowance as his brothers in like condition who happened to be on the pension-roll at $50 on June 16, 1880. We therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY C. SNOW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4122) granting a pension to Mary C. Snow.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Snow, widow of Thomas Snow, late a captain in the Second New Hampshire Regiment.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4122) granting a pension to Mary E. Snow, submit the following report:

Thomas Snow, captain of Company F, Second New Hampshire Regiment, was mustered June 4, 1861, and discharged for disability August 12, 1862. He died April 18, 1880, and the claim of his widow, Mary E. Snow, for pension was rejected on the ground that cause of officer's death (pneumonia) was not due to the service.

That Captain Snow lost his health in the service is established by an exceptionally strong line of evidence.

Oliver Fernald, of Great Falls, N. H., testifies:

"That he was personally and intimately acquainted with the above-named Snow; that said Snow was employed by the above-named corporation [Great Falls Manufacturing Company] as overseer of the weaving-room; that previous to said Snow entering the United States service the said Fernald was superintendent of the machine-shop and saw Snow almost daily, and he was a person of good health, sound, and robust; that said Fernald never heard of said Snow being sick or disabled from his daily labor a day for three years previous to enlistment. That after his return home he was entirely broken down and suffering, as reported, with intermittent fever, ague, and chills, and chronic diarrhea; for a long time, some year or more, entirely unable to perform any manual labor, and from our intimacy and conversation, and his debilitated condition, in my opinion he was three-fourths disabled from performing manual labor up to the time he went to Marblehead, 1872."

Freeman Chick and Calvin H. Weymouth, both of Great Falls, strongly corroborate this testimony.

During the period covered by this testimony claimant was unable to furnish medical testimony, for the reason that Drs. C. F. Elliot and J. M. Buckman, who treated him, are dead. But the period from 1872, when he removed to Marblehead, until his death is covered by Dr. M. V. B. Morse, of Marblehead, whose reputation is vouched to the Department as "excellent," and who certifies:

"I was the physician of Thomas Snow, and attended him eight years, more or less, up to the time of his death. The first time I was called to attend him he was suffering quite severely from an attack of intermittent fever associated with chronic diarrhea, which he alleged were contracted while in the military service of the United States in the line of his duty. From the time I was first called to see him up to the time of his death he was a constant sufferer from the above diseases, which gradually reduced his health, until they finally caused his death on the 18th day of April, 1880. For the last eight years of his life his health was such that he could not perform but a very limited amount of manual labor. There can be no doubt of the fact that the above diseases, which resulted in his death, were contracted in the Army."

In response to a subsequent letter of inquiry from claimant's attorney, he wrote:

"I now recall at the time of his death he took a severe cold, and in his weak condition he was sick but a very short time with this cold, and died. I think that at his death the cause was reported at the time pneumonia, but I am positive that the cause of death was due to the diseases contracted in the Army."

Capt. Harrison D. F. Young and Lieut. Samuel P. Sayles, both of the Second Regiment, testify to the perfect health of Captain Snow when he assumed command of his company in June, 1861, to the incurrence of a severe dysentery on the march to first Bull Run, which afterward assumed a chronic form; also to malarial symptoms; the combined effects of which finally broke him down and led to his resignation.

The Adjutant-General of the United States Army reports the organization books incomplete, but medical certificates upon which he was granted leave of absence in July, 1862, set forth that he was suffering with bilious diarrhea, attended with a good deal of fever.

The line of evidence establishing prior soundness, incurrence of disability in the service, and continuance of the disability in severe form until his death, is unimpeachable. The rejection of the widow's claim was upon a technicality which overruled and ignored the sworn opinion of the reputable physician who attended Captain Snow for eight years and in his last sickness.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY B. SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3505) for the relief of Mary B. Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary B. Smith, mother of Leonard A. Smith, late a private in the Seventh Wisconsin Battery of Light Artillery Volunteers, who died from the effects of starvation while a prisoner at Andersonville and other Southern prisons, and to pay her a pension as provided by law for dependent widows and mothers.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3505) for the relief of Mary B. Smith, after considering the same, submit the following report:

The applicant, Mary B. Smith, is the mother of Leonard A. Smith, late a private in the Seventh Wisconsin Battery of Light Artillery Volunteers, who was captured and taken as a prisoner after or during an engagement with the enemy at or near Guntown, Miss., on or about the 11th day of June, 1864, and confined at Andersonville prison, in Georgia, and at Charleston, S. C. The said Leonard A. Smith died from the effects of starvation and exposure suffered while confined in the aforesaid prisons, as shown by the following letter on file with applicant's papers in the Pension Office:

HOSPITAL STEAMER GEORGE LEARY,
Port Royal Harbor, South Carolina, December 17, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Leonard A. Smith, Seventh Wisconsin Battery Light Artillery, died on board this steamer this day from the effects of starvation while a prisoner. His effects you will find inclosed. He was buried at Beaufort, S. C. Was received from the rebels in Charleston Harbor the 16th instant. For further particulars address the Adjutant-General, Washington, D. C.

Respectfully,

HENRY C. SMITH,
Clerk George Leary.

From the testimony in the case it appears that the applicant and her husband, Ami Smith, are quite aged, both being nearly seventy-five years of age. That they were somewhat dependent on the son, Leonard A. Smith, for support, is established by affiant's declaration and the testimony of Noah Smith, who states on oath:

"I have been personally and intimately acquainted with Mrs. Mary B. Smith and her family and the circumstances by which they are and have been surrounded since the year 1863. She was the mother of three sons, Luther B. Smith, Leonard A. Smith, and Gustavus A. Smith, all of whom enlisted and served in the United States Army during the war of the rebellion. The said son, Leonard A. Smith, enlisted in the Seventh Wisconsin Battery of Light Artillery Volunteers as a private on or about the 12th of November, 1863; was captured during or just after an engagement with the enemy at or near Guntown, Miss., on or about the 11th day of June, 1864, while actiag under the lawful orders of his superior officers and in the line of his duty; was taken as a prisoner of war to Andersonville, Ga., and there starved and inhumanly treated, from the effects of which he became sick and died.

"The said Leonard A. Smith was received on board the hospital steamer George Leary from the rebel authorities in Charleston Harbor, South Carolina, on the 16th day of December, 1864, and died on board said steamer on the 17th day of December, 1864, from the effects of starvation while a prisoner of war, and that the said soldier left surviving neither widow nor child, having never married; that he always contributed toward the support and comfort of his mother during his lifetime; that the said applicant and her husband own some property, worth in the aggregate about $800, and in their old age this does not furnish them a support, owing to their advanced age and poor health, and they are unable, in any manner whatever, from gaining their support from any personal efforts of their own."

This witness is corroborated by others.

Your committee, in view of the fact that this aged couple furnished three sons to defend the country in time of its need, one of whom suffered all the horrors of a cruel death, should not in their old age be left to buffet against the cold winds of adversity unaided by the Government, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill, after striking out all after the word "pension," in line 9, and inserting "as provided by law for dependent widows and mothers."

The amendment recommended by the committee in the last paragraph of the report was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE W. GUYSE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3205) granting a pension to George W. Guyse.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. Guyse, late of Company L, First Regiment Alabama Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3205) granting a pension to George W. Guyse, submit the following report;

The claimant enlisted on the 25th day of September, 1863, for one year, as a private in Company L, First Alabama Cavalry, and was discharged September 28, 1864, and filed his application for a pension on the ground of disability incurred while in the service and in the line of duty, to wit, a gunshot wound in the left knee received in a skirmish with the enemy at Jackson, Tenn., on or about the 25th day of December, 1863. Said claim was rejected on the ground that there is no record of the alleged gunshot wound of left knee, and no satisfactory evidence showing the origin of said wound while in the service in the line of duty, and claimant declared his inability to furnish further testimony.

Claimant alleges that at Jackson, Tenn., about December 25, 1863, he received a gunshot wound in left knee immediately below the knee-cap, while engaged in a skirmish with Forrest's command, and that he can not furnish the testimony of a commissioned officer for the reason that his captain was not in command when he was wounded, but was on detached service and never was in actual command of the company; that Lieutenant Fishback, who was in command, is dead, having died before claimant filed his application for pension; and that Lieutenant Fiter can not be found, although he had made diligent search and inquiry for him; and that he is unable to furnish further testimony of comrades or of persons who saw and examined his wound at the date of discharge except David Cummings; that affiant is a cripple and extremely poor, and it is utterly impossible for him to make any further proof of parties who saw his wounds at the date of his discharge.

Isom Fleetwood, a comrade, swears that on or about the 24th of December, 1863, while engaged in battle with Forrest's command near Jackson, Tenn., the claimant was wounded in the left knee, and, to the best of affiant's belief, was taken to a field hospital near Corinth, Miss., and treated for his wound for about six weeks; that he saw claimant several times while he was in the hospital, and examined his wound, and was present when he was wounded, and knows that he was wounded while engaged in battle, and saw him taken off the field while the fight was going on.

Peter F. Holt, another comrade, swears to substantially the same state of facts.

Dr. James W. Stewart swears that he examined the claimant's wounded leg, and that the wound is located in the left leg immediately below the patella, or knee-cap, it being in affiant's opinion the result of a gunshot; ball penetrated below the knee-cap, dividing the tendon that unites the patella to the tibia, and has destroyed the usefulness of the limb to the amount of about one-fourth of total disability, and that he had known claimant about one month.

Dr. A. H. Jones swears substantially to a similar state of facts, and that he did not know claimant prior to the examination.

David Cummings swears that claimant was wounded while engaged in action; that he examined his wound about the time he was discharged, and a month or two afterward; there was a deep scar just below the left knee-cap, the leg above and below the wound being considerably shrunk and smaller than the right leg; there was a sink, as well as he remembers, at a point where scar is located, and seemed to affiant that some of the bones or tendons had been wounded, causing claimant to limp very badly, left leg seeming to be shorter than the right; affiant lived near claimant after he returned from the Army, and saw him very frequently.

Dr. James W. Stewart is also the examining surgeon of the Pension Office, and rated applicant's disability to about $6 per month.

It is but fair to state that there is some evidence of other parties tending to throw some shadow on the credibility of claimant's testimony, and if taken alone might create a doubt of his right to a pension; and as we rely upon the examination made by the medical experts, one of whom was an agent of the Government, we can not fail to conclude that claimant received his disability in the service and in the line of duty, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill, after striking out all after the word "cavalry," in line 7.

The amendment recommended by the committee in the last paragraph of the report was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET A. BLAKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2021) granting a pension to Margaret A. Blake.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States the name of Margaret A. Blake, widow of George A. H. Blake, late colonel of the First Cavalry and a brevet brigadier-general in the United States Army, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $30 a month from and after the passage of this act, subject to all the other provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report in that case be read.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2021) granting a pension to Margaret A. Blake, widow of George A. H. Blake, late colonel of the First Cavalry and a brevet brigadier-general in the United States Army, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

General George A. H. Blake was born in Pennsylvania and appointed from that State first lieutenant Second Dragoons, June 11, 1836; in Florida to 1841, and engaged in action with the Seminole Indians at Fort Welborn, Jupiter Inlet, and other engagements; captain Second Dragoons, December 3, 1839; was in the Indian Territory and Texas; in the war with Mexico, and engaged in the battles of Cerro Gordo, defense of Pueblo, battles of Contreras, Molino del Rey, Chapultepec, and City of Mexico; brevet major United States Army, August 17, 1847, for gallant and meritorious conduct in an affair at Saint Augustine, Mexico; major First Dragoons, July 23, 1850; in Missouri, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, California, Nevada, Oregon, and Washington Territory to 1861, and engaged against the Apache and Navajo Indians; lieutenant-colonel First Cavalry, February 15, 1862; engaged in the Seven Days' fight and battle of Gaines's Mill, Virginia (in which he was slightly wounded); chief commissary of musters, Department of Virginia, to April, 1863; chief commissary of cavalry corps, Army of the Potomac, to December, 1863; was present at the actions of Aldie, Middletown, Upperville, and battle of Gettysburg; special duty in the cavalry bureau, Washington, D. C., to April, 1864; commanding cavalry depot Giesboro' Point, Maryland, to September 1, 1864; special duty to February, 1865; member of a military commission at Washington, D. C., to March, 1866; brevet brigadier-general United States Army, March 15, 1865, for "gallant and efficient services during the Gettysburg campaign;" commanding regiment and post of Fort Vancouver, Washington, and retired at his own request "for over forty years' service," December 15, 1870.

Thus it will be seen that for forty years and in three wars this faithful officer served his country in various positions of trust and responsibility, and finally retired from the service full of years and honors. The claim of his widow for pension was rejected on the ground that the "fatal disease originated subsequent to his retirement."

Strictly construed, as the law must necessarily be by the Pension Department, this was probably a correct decision for that department to make. But giving due weight to all the consequences and effects of a service continued for so many years, and in every variety of climate, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific, and from the City of Mexico to Gettysburg, your committee are of the opinion that it is not proven that his death did not originate from disease contracted in the service, and are disposed to give his widow the benefit of the doubt as to this point, and they are further of the opinion that, in view of the long and valuable services of General Blake, his widow, who is in impoverished circumstances, should have the pension asked for in the bill, and they therefore recommend its passage.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I was about to ask for the reading of the report in this case, not, however, for the purpose of objecting to this bill, because I recognize the fact that those who are by profession and for their lives the soldiers of the country are in a different position from ordinary volunteers. I wish merely to say that for the future I mean to draw a distinction, and to make a fight against every bill that gives to the widow of a volunteer officer a preference over the widow of a private soldier.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I hope the gentleman will reconsider his determination.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. No, sir. Just look at the question. Take for instance, two brothers raised in the same town, volunteering in the same war. Before entering the service they marry two sisters, who are equally talented, equally respectable, occupying equal stations in society. These two brothers go into the war. One becomes an officer; the other remains a private. The private, as everybody knows who has been engaged in war, has the hardest time. These two brothers are killed; and the one sister, because her husband happened to have a soft place as an officer in the Army, draws two or three times as much pension as the other sister whose husband was in the ranks bearing all the brunt of battle. We have had instance after instance of that sort in this House. Such a discrimination ought to be stopped.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words fixing the amount of the pension, my object being to leave the amount subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws. I will not detain the House with any argument, but I want a vote on that amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 a month from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. WINANS. The adoption of that amendment would leave this lady to draw the same pension she now gets.

Mr. PRICE. And I will say that is as large a sum as is now drawn by thousands of other women as good as she is, assuming that she is as good a woman as any on earth. Other women with nerves as sensitive, with impulses as heroic, with purposes as patriotic, are drawing no greater pension.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I quite agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE]. I think that these questions as to the rating of pensions ought to be left always to the law and the medical boards established for that purpose. We are not likely to go wrong or to do injustice in putting persons on the pension-roll, if we leave such questions to be determined in that way.

Mr. STEELE. I would remind the gentleman that the examining board does not have to examine widows. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understand that this is the case of a widow's pension; but nevertheless I was referring to a principle, and a principle only—a principle which I believe should invariably govern this House in the granting of pensions—the principle of allowing pensions to be determined by the law and by the boards of examination. While there is no medical examination in this case, nevertheless there is a law governing it. The law fixes the pensions for widows of officers; and when widows are placed on the roll subject to the law, then, as my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] says, they go on the roll upon an equality with all others of like rank.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I object to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I do not think it right in this particular case, nor do I believe it right in principle. We must remember that these professional soldiers are at all times expected to be the guardians of the liberties and property of the people and of the interests of the Government. They are deprived of opportunities to engage in civil business and to make money. They have no opportunity of doing anything outside their military profession for the support of their families. Almost every civilized country recognizes the principle of taking care of its professional soldiers, upon whom it must depend at all times. The case is not the same with volunteers. Except when directly engaged in war they are at liberty to carry on their private business. While acting as soldiers they are simply performing a part of their duty as citizens, and no civilized country puts them upon the same footing as those who make military duty the business of their lives. When a meritorious Army officer, after long service, leaves his widow without a sufficient support, I think we are violating no principle of law or justice in giving such a woman a higher pension than we would give to the widow of a volunteer soldier.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understood the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WINANS] to say that if the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] should be adopted this lady would receive the same pension she is now receiving.

Mr. WINANS. I was mistaken about that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thought so.

Mr. WINANS. She is now drawing no pension at all.

Mr. BUCHANAN. She is drawing no pension, her application, as the report shows, having been rejected for the reasons there stated.

Mr. WINANS. That is true.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This bill will put her upon the pension-roll. Why should there be a rating allowed in this case when it was not allowed in the case of the man I spoke of a while ago?

Mr. PRICE's amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM PAUGH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2070) granting a pension to William Paugh.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Paugh, late a private in Company A, Sixty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) was read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2070) granting a pension to William Paugh, have examined the papers on file in the Pension Department, and make the following report:

They find that the Committee on Invalid Pensions, Forty-eighth Congress, had this claim before them for their consideration, and made a report thereon, which this committee believes to be a true presentation of the case, and which, having verified by a close examination of the papers, they adopt as their own, and ask that it be so considered.

"William Paugh, the soldier above named, enlisted as a private in Company D, Sixty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, September 10, 1861, and was honorably discharged from the service July 14, 1865, and filed his declaration for a pension September, 6, 1865, for disability incurred from a gunshot wound of the right shoulder, June 15, 1864, from which he partly lost his speech and was injured in his lungs.

"In a statement filed, the date of his injury is fixed in the spring of 1863, and exposure is set forth as an additional cause of his sickness. On muster-out roll, dated July 1, 1865, the soldier is reported as 'absent sick.' In May and June, 1863, he is reported 'absent in general hospital,' and is reported absent sick till December 31, 1863. The records of Surgeon-General's Office show that he was admitted to Mount Pleasant General Hospital, Washington, D. C., June 10, 1863, with contusion of back. They also show that he received a gunshot wound, and was treated in field hospital Second Army Corps, Chancellorsville, Va., May 4, 1863. That he was several times treated in the hospital, and that he entered private hospital, Chester, Pa., September 18, 1864, with fracture of the humerus.

"Two comrades, P. Connelly and Charles Rodgers, testify to his being wounded in the right shoulder at Bristoe Station, Va., June, 1863. They also testify to the soldier's exposure at Harper's Ferry, from which claimant took cold, which settled on his lungs. They also testify to his soundness before and his disability since his military service.

"Doctors Snyder and Delcamp testify to having treated the soldier in 1865, 1869, 1870, 1872, for lung and bronchial troubles, and the latter says for wound of right shoulder.

"Comrade Rodgers says further that while he did not see the applicant hit, yet says he saw him go into a severe skirmish at Bristoe Station, Va., sound and well, and that he saw him right afterward with the wound.

"The Pension Bureau rejected the claim for the reason that there was no record entered of the wound, and his inability to furnish satisfactory evidence of the fact that the wound was received as alleged. Neither of the reasons are well founded. The hospital record shows that the soldier was wounded May 4, 1863. That June 10, 1863, he was treated in the general hospital for contusion of the back; that in April, 1864, and May, 1865, he was in the hospital for fracture of humerus.

"The difficulty has clearly happened through carelessness in inserting the wrong date in the declaration, and from the carelessness in the surgeons not stating fully the facts concerning the injury; for instance, how the fracture of the humerus occurred Had it been done it is manifest that it would have then appeared on the record that the same was caused by the explosion of a shell or from gunshot wound. Neither is it correct that the injury is not proven independent of hospital treatment.

"Another reason given is that no disability now exists as shown by the board of surgeons. Yet the affidavits all go to show the contrary. In 1865 the Surgeon-General's report rates him at one-half disability, and in 1880 Examining Surgeon Strawbridge rates him at three-eighths.

"The committee are of the opinion that the soldier is entitled to a pension and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

E. B. SWEENY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3633) granting a pension to E. B. Sweeny.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of E. B. Sweeny, late a member of the Signal Corps of the United States Army.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) was read.

POLLY HALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3141) granting a pension to Polly Hall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Polly Hall, mother of Amos Hall, late of Company G, Fourth Regiment of Michigan Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. WINANS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3141) granting a pension to Polly Hall, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

That Polly Hall is the mother of Amos L. Hall, late a corporal in Company G, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, who enlisted May 16, 1861, for three years or during the war, and on the 27th day of June, 1862, at the battle of Gaines Hill, Va., he received a gunshot wound in the right thigh, by reason of which he was discharged September 6, 1862. He applied for and received a pension at the rate of $8 per month until his death, February 26, 1881.

The files in the case show that shortly after his discharge he became partially insane and gradually grew worse, and finally was, April 12, 1871, sent to the Government Hospital for the Insane, at Washington, where he died, as stated, February 26, 1881.

January 9, 1882, the mother of this soldier, Polly Hall, applied for a pension as a dependent mother, which was rejected on the ground that the insanity and ultimate death of the soldier was not attributable to the wound he received in the service.

Upon this question the evidence before the Pension Office, both medical and lay, is conflicting. On the 13th of December, 1870, the soldier in the case applied for an increase of pension, and it was finally referred to a special examiner, who submitted a report February 17, 1873, in which he says:

"Amos Hall applied for increase of pension; he was pensioned for gunshot wound of the right femur from September 13, 1862, at $8 per month; he now applies, by his legal guardian, for an increase, alleging that the disability has greatly increased and has resulted in insanity. The mother of claimant testifies that her son came home to Clinton, Mich., the latter part of September, 1862, very thin in flesh, and was very nervous, restless at night, and subject to spasms and fits."

Dr. Philip Reeder, of Cleveland, ex-surgeon, says:

"He first visited claimant in 1865; he was insane at the time; I am inclined to the opinion that the epilepsy and the insanity had its origin in the exposure and extremity of mind to which he was subjected. I have observed nothing in the soldier's habits or practices which, in my judgment, could produce his present mental and physical condition."

Dr. John Dickenson, late assistant surgeon Thirtieth Ohio, and surgeon of One hundred and ninety-fifth Volunteer Infantry, says:

"I am acquainted with Amos Hall. I examined him at the time he was sent to the Soldiers' Home with a view of ascertaining whether his insanity was the result of military service. I reached an affirmative conclusion."

D. S. Oliphant, M. D., testifies:

"That previous to his being wounded he was sound in mind and body; that owing to exposure after being wounded, being three days and nights on the battle-field before removal, he contracted brain fever, and was three months confined to hospital and discharged with shattered intellect, and has since lapsed into a state of incurable insanity."

Dr. J. C. Stanton examined claimant June 13, 1872, and finds gunshot wound and insanity, and rated him total first grade. The mother and sister of soldier both testify under oath that no member of their family was ever insane to their knowledge; that claimant was a man of excellent habits and good health when he entered the service. He returned home in September, 1862, and had spasms from the day of his arrival, and was out of his mind much of the time; that they kept him at home as long as they could. The special examiner closes his report by recommending that the pension be increased to total first grade, $31.25. The report was not concurred in for the reason that the medical examiners were not able to arrive at the conclusion that insanity was the result of his service.

The mother's claim was also rejected on the ground that the death of the soldier was not traceable to the injury received in the service.

There is no question but that Polly Hall is the mother of Amos Hall; that she was dependent on him for support. Her husband is dead; she has no other children to support her; she is now eighty-four years of age, living on the charity of friends and contributions of Grand Army of the Republic posts.

In view of these facts, and that it is fair to presume that the suffering and exposure of the wounded soldier caused the brain fever resulting in insanity and death, your committee recommend the passage of the bill, and that it be amended, in the sixth line, by inserting after "Polly Hall" the word "dependent," and the letter "L" between Amos and Hall; so it will read "Polly Hall, dependent mother of Amos L. Hall."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2022) granting a pension to Ellen M. Mitchell.

Mr. SWOPE. My colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] who introduced this bill was unable to be present on account of illness, and requested that this bill should be informally passed over for the present, not to lose its place upon the Calendar; and accordingly I make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

STEPHEN GARDNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1184) granting a pension to Stephen Gardner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Stephen Gardner, late of Company D, Tenth Regiment Michigan Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. WINANS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1184) granting a pension to Stephen Gardner, submit the following report:

That Stephen Gardner was mustered into the service March 20, 1864, in Company D, Tenth Regiment Michigan Infantry, and was discharged at the close of the war, July 19, 1865. He applied for a pension March 10, 1875, alleging hernia, caused by a fall and being run over during a charge in the battle of Jonesborough, Ga., September 1, 1864. His claim was rejected on the ground of no record of rupture and no satisfactory proof of incurrence in the service.

C. W. Stockwell, ex-surgeon, certifies, May 10, 1875, that he examined Gardner and finds "double inguinal hernia—right very large, coming far down in scrotum."

The proof as to incurrence is two comrades, John D. McKenzie, who says he saw him fall and afterward procured him a truss, and George Edwards, who remembers hearing Gardner complain of being hurt, and of a comrade procuring a truss for him.

Henry Wideman, late captain of Company D, states that claimant told him he had procured a truss for his rupture, and that he received it by falling in a ditch September 1, 1864.

The case was referred for special examination, during which two witnesses testified they had been informed Gardner had hernia at the time he enlisted. For this reason, and because there was no record evidence, the claim was rejected.

The testimony of Dr. Miles Huckins shows that Gardner was suffering from a rupture on his return home from the Army.

From all the evidence in this case your committee are inclined to believe the incurrence of hernia was as stated by Gardner. He served faithfully from enlistment to close of the war. He was no bounty-jumper, and had no reason to conceal any disability existing at time of enlistment.

His examination at time of muster disclosed no disability. He could have had no thought of laying the foundation of a pension at the time he says he was hurt. He shirked no service by going to hospital, but made the best effort he could and as little complaint, and kept in line of duty, with no thought of pension or reward until increasing disability compelled him, ten years after discharge, to ask relief by pension. His disability at close of war and since is not disputed or in doubt.

We therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ANN J. CONWELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3177) for placing the name of Mrs. Ann J. Conwell on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Ann J. Conwell, widow of Matthew Conwell, late a private in Company I, First Indiana Cavalry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3177) granting a pension to Ann J. Conwell, submit the following report:

Ann J. Conwell is the widow of Mathew Conwell, late a private in Company I, First Indiana Cavalry. She asks to be placed upon the pension-roll as his widow. The facts in the case, substantiated by affidavit, are peculiar, inasmuch as she appears as the widow of two soldiers, one of whom gave up his life in service; the other, disabled by wound and disease.

The facts are as follows: Her first marriage was with one Edward Blumely, at Willimantic, Conn., upon the 29th of November, 1855. On the 1st of October, 1861, he enlisted as a private in Company D, Eighth Connecticut Volunteers, and re-enlisted as a veteran at the expiration of his term of service. On October 6, 1864, he died in Andersonville prison, leaving the beneficiary in this bill with three small children to provide for. She applied for and obtained a widow's pension, and struggled along as best she could with the aid of the pension to clothe and feed herself and children. Finding herself unable to properly care for and bring up her family, on January 5, 1867, she married Matthew Conwell, a pensioned soldier, who, though at that time suffering from a wound and from other disabilities, was by superior skill at his trade, that of "spring-fitter," able to earn good wages.

He had served as a private soldier in the First Indiana Cavalry, and was pensioned upon certificate 39980, first for $2 and afterward at $4 per month. As time went on his disabilities increased, and finally, in 1877, he was admitted as an inmate of the Soldiers' Home at Dayton, Ohio, suffering from his gunshot wound of shoulder, asthma, and heart disease, of which disease he finally died, and which he always claimed he contracted in the service. The death occurred March 30, 1882, at the Soldiers' Home aforementioned. The certificate of death gives the cause, "organic disease of the heart."

Her claim was rejected for the reason that the disease of which soldier died was not due to his military service. This widow is old, infirm, and poor. She believes she ought to be entitled to be placed upon the roll, when the circumstances of her earlier struggles and bereavements are considered.

Your committee are of opinion that this is a proper case for relief, and would therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALONZO MAYNARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3478) granting an increase of pension to Alonzo Maynard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alonzo Maynard, late a private in Company I, Eleventh Connecticut Volunteers, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving, to commence from the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3478) to increase the pension of Alonzo Maynard, submit the following report:

Alonzo Maynard enlisted in Company I, Eleventh Connecticut Volunteers, and was discharged March 25, 1863, for gunshot wound received at Antietam. He applied for and received a pension on certificate 18040, October 6, 1863, at the rate of $8 per month, which has been increased from time to time until June 4, 1872, he was rated $31.25, which he received until March 15, 1884, when, upon application for increase, it was rejected, and under order No. 35 he was reduced to $30 per month, the reason being given that the disability from which he was rendered helpless, requiring aid and attention, was rheumatism, a disability not proved.

The evidence in this case discloses that the man has suffered terribly ever since discharge from the gunshot wound to right lung, which injured his spine and resulted in total incapacity for any manual labor.

E. F. Parsons, of Enfield, Conn., practicing physician, testifies he has treated claimant at different times during the past five years (1879 to 1884); that he is suffering from deformity and disability, resulting from his wounds, from rheumatism, making his right arm nearly helpless; that the diminution of aerating surface in the lungs from loss of lung tissue causes great dyspnœa on exercise, which, together with rheumatism of his legs and feet, cripples him to that extent he can walk only a few rods at a time; that his disabilities render him practically helpless.

Drs. Jarvis and Fuller, examining surgeons at Hartford, say:

"Two balls entered near the right side of the spinal column, at the third dorsal vertebra. There are four deep cicatrices in this region, covering a space perpendicularly of 6 inches by 4 horizontally. There are four cicatrices between the clavicle and scapula. In front, right side, there is one large cicatrix on the point of the shoulder, one directly above and one below the inner half of the clavicle, one just to the inner side of the mamma, and one just below the nipple, causing much contraction of the mammary gland. The lung was apparently riddled; soldier says he was hit with bullet and buckshot."

R. Strickland, Enfield, Conn., examining surgeon, says September 11, 1883:

"What remains of right lung of little use for purposes of respiration; dullness on percussion over whole lung; left lung nearly sound; right arm nearly useless from extensive caries and loss of bone of shoulder, following the wound. Left arm he can use only in a very limited degree, resulting from wound: rheumatism. His urine dribbles from him, being unable to retain it. He has a cough, which at times is quite troublesome; yet with all these symptoms he is fat and eats well. He appears nearly helpless and demands the regular aid of another person."

J. R. Lewis, examining surgeon, Rockville, Conn., October 2, 1885, says:

"The track of the wound involves the upper right lung, and has resulted in suppuration and absorption of the greater portion of said lung; the upper and lower extremities have become dropsical, and the patient is helpless, or so nearly as to require the constant personal aid and attendance of another person. Large burrowing abscesses frequently form upon the chest."

Photographs exhibited to the committee of this soldier show both breast and back views, both of which are covered with deep and long scars. The right shoulder is apparently several inches lower than the left, and the soldier is drawn out of shape.

Your committee, after a careful consideration of all the evidence in the case, which is mostly professional, are of the opinion the rating of this pensioner should be advanced. They would therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as amended by substituting the word "forty," in the seventh line, for the word "fifty."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AUGUSTA M. RICHARDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1107) granting a pension to Augusta M. Richards.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Augusta M. Richards, a volunteer nurse in the late war, and pay her the sum of $20 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 1107, beg leave to submit the following report:

Mrs. Augusta M. Richards, of Malden, Mass., was a volunteer nurse in the hospitals of New Orleans after its capture by the Union forces. Mrs. Richards went to New Orleans from the North early in 1861, and taught a private school for young ladies. From the opening of the port by Admiral Farragut, or as soon thereafter as the Saint James and Saint Louis hospitals were established, her duties began, first by spending all the spare hours at her disposal, before and after school, in every kind of service in her power to render, to alleviate the suffering of the sick and wounded soldiers, many times furnishing food from her own home to those who seemed to need something more delicate and palatable than the hospitals afforded. During these ministrations she was stricken down with small-pox contracted in Saint James hospital. At this time she had a prosperous school, which yielded her about $150 per month, while her daughter, who was with her, had a class of young ladies in music, whom she visited daily, which business was, by reason of the contagious disease, entirely ruined and permanently broken up, thus cutting off their means of support. This occurred in April, 1864. Upon her recovery she resumed her work in the hospital, remaining in it until the close of the war in 1865.

She presents much evidence to corroborate the statements above made, from soldiers whom she had nursed and cared for; from doctors as to her incurrence of small-pox while engaged in the duties claimed.

The following, from Dr. S. H. Orton, in charge Saint James Hospital:

McDOUGAL U. S. A. HOSPITAL (near Fort Schuyler, N. Y. H.),
September 11, 1865.

This will certify that Mrs. Augusta M. Richards contracted small-pox while attending the sick and wounded of the Union troops at the Saint James United States Army Hospital at New Orleans in May, 1864, and was under my professional charge during her sickness, which was attended with great danger and pecuniary loss, she having been deprived of all her pupils through fear of contagion.

Mrs. Richards will ever be remembered by me as having been of the greatest service in assisting the sick by every means in her power.

SAMUEL HENRY ORTON,
Brevet Major and Assistant Surgeon, United States Army, Commanding, Formerly in charge of Saint James United States Army Hospital, New Orleans.

That General Banks, then in command of the department, thought highly of her services is shown by the following safeguard order:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF, NEW ORLEANS,
September 9, 1864.

Mrs. Richards, 109 Coliseum street, has devoted her time and exposed her life in assisting the sick and wounded men of the Army.

She pays rent for the house she occupies to the Treasury agent. She is a thoroughly loyal woman, to whom the Government is indebted both for her assistance and her sacrifices, and will not be disturbed without orders from these headquarters.

N. P. BANKS,
Major-General, Commanding.

More and specific evidence might be given to strengthen this case if necessary, but it would seem that sufficient had been adduced to show that this lady gave her services freely until prostrated by a dread disease; that upon recovery, even though her means of support was gone, she went on with her work until the last gun was fired in the great contest. For all this disinterested, noble, and self-sacrificing work she never received a dollar of pay from the Government. She is a widow. Since the war she has been supported by her son, a resident of New Orleans; but reverses in business have overtaken him recently and cut short her means for support. She has no property or income, and is, at the age of seventy-two, left without means of support.

Your committee are of opinion that this lady through her services and sacrifices has richly earned the right to the relief she asks for the few remaining years of her life. They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. LOVERING. That ought to be $25 a month instead of $20; and I therefore move that amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What is the usual pension?

Mr. LOVERING. In the case of volunteer nurses who devoted their time without any compensation it is $25 a month.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. They should all be served alike.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS G. NEWMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1367) to place the name of Thomas G. Newman on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to place the name of Thomas G. Newnam, late of Company K, Ninth Missouri Regiment State Militia Cavalry, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws of the United States.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to place the name of Thomas G. Newnam on the pension-roll."

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1367) to place the name of Thomas G. Newman on the pension-roll, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted April 23, 1863, in Company K, Ninth Missouri State Militia, and was discharged May 29, 1865. He had served the year preceding in Companies A and E, Forty-sixth Missouri State Militia. He filed an application for pension March, 1883, alleging lung disease and sciatic rheumatism, which was rejected on the ground of no record and no evidence of origin and no medical evidence since. There is no record, for the very good reason that the hospital records are not on file. Claimant states that he sent Fitzgerald & Co. an application for a pension in 1877, and supposed they had filed it. He further states—

"That in April, 1865, while stationed at Sturgeon, Mo., word came in that a lot of guerrillas were between said camp and Columbia, and that Captain Cook, of Company C, was after them, and that they could join him at a certain point. A detail of fifteen men was made, claimant being one of the men. Left camp about 1 p. m. Sunday. An hour later it commenced raining, gently at first, but it increased until it got to be a steady pour, and it so continued until 4 o'clock p. m. next day. About dark Sunday evening they joined Captain Cook, and the whole command were in the saddle until 3 o'clock the next morning. Then took a rest, using their saddles for pillows to keep their heads out of water. Claimant was placed in charge of seven men by Lieutenant Hawkins, with orders to run down the guerrillas. They rode until about 10 o'clock a. m., when they discovered four men on the other side of a stream. They hailed one another, when the four men fired and retreated. They followed them several miles and then returned to Sturgeon, after nearly a continuous ride of twenty-four hours, and from that time he was never able for any kind of duty. He applied for a furlough, and, receiving it, went to Macon City, Mo., where the regimental headquarters then were, where he met Dr. A. B. Castle, assistant surgeon of his regiment.

Dr. Castle corroborates the above, in the following language, given under oath:

I have the following statement to make from memoranda in my possession: Early in April, 1865, claimant was exposed to wet and cold while on a scout in Boone County, Missouri, and pneumonia resulted therefrom. He made a bad recovery—that is, his lungs were seriously impaired, and he suffered from sciatic rheumatism, so that at times he could only walk with the aid of sticks. His health seemed utterly broken. He was examined by myself and Surg. J. H. Peabody, United States Army, on the 26th of May, 1865, and immediately ordered to Saint Louis for muster-out. Newman was walking with a cane in a bent condition, complaining of rheumatism of the back and hips, and he had chronic bronchitis, which we then thought incurable. We apprehended the invasion of tubercular phthisis in the near future.

John Jones and Philip Liley testified that he has not since been an able-bodied man.

Claimant testifies that he was treated by Dr. Smith, now dead, in 1865, and by Dr. Dedman, who is also dead, in 1872.

H. J. Bates says he has known him intimately since 1875, and that he has seemed to be laboring under some disease of the lungs and rheumatism.

W. C. Harland and David Galloday testify that for several years they have filled prescriptions for claimant for pulmonary diseases.

The postmaster at Gun City says he has known him since 1871; that he was not then an able-bodied man, and has not improved since. The board of pension-examining surgeons, at Kansas City, report him, May 16, 1883, totally disabled from lung disease and rheumatism.

The testimony of Dr. Castle, so clear and positive, and whose reputation is vouched for as good, ought to establish the origin of the disease in the service. If the testimony of Drs. Smith and Dedman could be obtained it would establish continuance; as it is, your committee are forced, from the evidence before them, to the conclusion that the soldier lost his health in the military service; that his disabilities have continued ever since, and that his present condition is the result of that service. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, before that I want to detain the committee, by its consent, some fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. Let us vote on the amendment first.

Mr. WOLFORD. I want to talk about fifteen or twenty minutes and then I will give way for any motion the gentleman desires to make. I want to use this time, Mr. Chairman, so that we will understand each other better than we have been doing on these pension nights; and I hope I will be permitted to proceed for a few minutes.

There is a feeling, sir—and this bill is a proper one to make the remarks upon, and I hope I will have the attention of gentlemen, especially of my friend from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] and my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER]—there is a feeling, I say, that we are going too fast on the subject of pensions. Now, it is known that I am pretty much in favor of pensions, and I want to call the attention of the committee for a few minutes to the arguments which are very commonly used that we are going too fast and are about to exhaust the Treasury.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not fear that you will go too fast if you will but go right; that is all.

Mr. WOLFORD. Well, I think we will go right if we go in the direction of granting pensions to our soldiers.

The first thing, Mr. Chairman, to which I wish to call attention is that there is a feeling of dissatisfaction with a large number of thinking, sensible Congressmen upon the subject of giving large pensions, frequent pensions, a great many pensions to our soldiers, although there seems to be a necessity for it. The soldiers of the country sorely need it. But there is complaint because, in the first place, as was so pertinently remarked in the sensible speech of my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] the other night, one portion of the country, one region of the country, gets the most of these pensions, while the other portion gets none; and I refer now to the South, and I call the attention of my friends upon the other side, the South, as stated by that distinguished man, and he does not oppose pensions, neither does anybody on this floor, but while the South in her misfortune and in her struggle to reinstate herself against the tremendous losses of the war pays about one-third of the revenue collected, none of the vast amount of pensions, or scarcely any of it, goes to the South. Now, brethren, that is a serious objection. We are all united now.

I do not feel like deserting our soldiers upon such a proposition as that; neither do I believe that the proposition I am about to submit will break the Treasury. I think it will have a good effect and be of advantage to the country, and I want to talk about that a few minutes. It is true, and we can not help that, that most of the pensions paid out go to other sections of the country instead of to the South. But suppose we make a compensation for it at the start, and I believe in a statesman having a system about him, that two or three things come into every system, and I say now, suppose we make a compensation for that? Suppose, in the first place, we agree that part of the money may be circulated in the South. That is what is needed, and that is the first ground of feeling a little sore about it; everybody can see that as it is presented.

Well, there were some laws passed during the war that took about ten millions of dollars from the South and covered it into the Treasury, and the Supreme Court of the United States says, in a very able decision, that that money belongs to the citizens. Now, while we give to our soldiers—and I mean when I say "our soldiers" the soldiers North and South, for we are all one people, all Union people, there is no disunionist now in this broad land—but, while we give to our soldiers who live in one section of country that immense amount of money for pensions, and I want gentlemen to remark and bear in mind that the soldiers are not laying by money, they all put it in circulation, let us give back the money that belongs to our Southern friends. You all remember what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] so well said when arguing the silver bill, that when you cause money to circulate among the people it will be beneficial to all, but if you withhold the circulation from them it will be worse than war, pestilence, and famine.

Now the great end of circulation, or the means of accomplishing it, is found in giving to the soldiers these pensions, which means not only comfort and ability to live—it not only means bread and sugar and coffee to his family, but it makes him love his country which remembers him, which gives his wife and children clothing, food, and education. They put this money in circulation, and it meets the demands of the country as a circulating medium. Again, another effect of it; they not only circulate the money but they are enabled to buy more goods. Now a great portion of the revenue we derive for the support of the Government is from our tariff.

If you give a poor family a hard run, and God knows that many of our soldiers are hard run, if you give them more money they will buy more goods, and it will add to our revenues, because a great many of these articles are brought from abroad. That of course brings more money into the Treasury. That is all right and proper, and our brethren of the South will not grumble; but if we go on to say that these poor people in the South who had their money taken from them by military forces, taken from them not as a measure of right but as a war measure, shall have it repaid to them, why then you will accomplish a great deal in the way of equalizing this pension business. Now, restore to them what the Supreme Court says is their right. Give them that $10,000,000 while we are giving several millions to the Union soldiers; and I want, Mr. Chairman, to make myself perfectly clear on this subject. I do not wish to be misunderstood.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Do you expect to dispose of that to-night?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir; and I want gentlemen to have an opportunity of hearing me. I say while we are giving to the Union soldiers millions of dollars, and it will take millions of dollars to pay the pensions that we owe them, and to meet all of these demands upon the country will take millions of dollars—I say while we are giving them millions of dollars let us pay to our brethren of the South that $10,000,000 that is theirs.

Let that go to the individuals to whom it belongs and let it circulate in the South. That is a kind of compensation; but that is not an equivalent for the vast amount that the Union soldiers of the war must have. But if you give them $10,000,000 there and then give the many millions that are voted to the Union soldiers it puts so much more money in circulation. Everybody is pleased. The North is pleased and the South is pleased.

Then there is another proposition to which I wish to call the attention of the committee.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him with a question?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRICE. To what particular $10,000,000 do you refer as payable to the South?

Mr. WOLFORD. It is $10,000,000 that were collected by military operations in the South from the people in the South, from individuals, that the Supreme Court has decided belonged to the people of the South. That money has been covered into our Treasury. We have it. I say, pay that back to them. It is theirs. If it is not according to law I do not ask it. But if it is theirs, if they are poor crippled men that we wounded—and we had to wound them, there was no other way to do [laughter]—if the men we wounded are now suffering, crippled, and disabled, and that money has been taken from them, I say, let it be given back and let it circulate in the South.

But there is another equivalent for what we have to pay to the Union soldiers, and about that I want to talk a little. There is a bill to pension the soldiers of the Mexican war; a bill to pension them for service. And I hope my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] will be in favor of that; for it is the only bill that ever has been introduced in this Congress that puts the general and the private exactly on the same footing, that gives a pension of $8 a month to every soldier and every general. It levels everybody. I hope the gentleman will be in favor of that. A good deal of that money will circulate in the South. That will be an equivalent.

The pension proposed in that bill is based upon the principle of service. I know that my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], whom I do not now see in his seat, is opposed to a service pension of any kind. He has just one idea on this proposition. It is that a man has to be wounded and wounded in a certain place before he is entitled to a pension at all [laughter]—that no other disability should entitle him to a pension. I am in favor of pensioning all our soldiers for service. The first pension that was ever given in the United States was to the Revolutionary soldier for service. Again, the brave soldiers of 1812 received a service pension. If we give the soldiers of the Mexican war a service pension, it will be distributed North and South, East and West. There are only about six thousand of them now and it will not cost a million dollars a year to pension all that are now surviving.

The Mexican veterans are now almost gone. They went to a foreign land to fight the battles of their country; and they got for you more than a million of square miles of the best territory in the world. They got your gold and silver mines by that fighting; and all the talk you hear in this place about silver never would be uttered here if it had not been for the valor of the soldiers of the Mexican war. [Laughter.] It has been computed that if paid for the territory we have got and for the mines we have got every soldier who fought in that war would have twice his weight in gold.

Sir, this is the only war in which we were ever engaged that paid us back anything. There was some division of sentiment about it. It was said by some that we had no right to invade Mexico. I thought differently, and went as a humble private when a boy to invade Mexico. I thought we ought to invade her, because I held to the doctrine that we of this country were a brotherhood; and the President of the United States, James K. Polk, said that our brothers since the annexation of Texas were being murdered by Mexicans coming over the Rio Grande, and we were bound to defend them to the last extremity. And then our Government said the Mexicans were treacherous and had violated their treaty obligations, and were cruel to the men they had captured.

We said then, we will have indemnity for the past and security for the future. And, ah, sir, what a grab we made! [Laughter.] Did anybody ever see such a grab? Why, sir, almost half the territory of the United States is at this time ours as the consequence of that war. We whipped Mexico and made her acknowledge she would pay an indemnity. You will say there was a kind of duress, but it was according to the plan of our Government, and we got the amount.

Now, sir, are these soldiers that suffered so much hardship in that war—are they to be ignored? I am sure gentlemen will vote that they shall not be.

Mr. PRICE. If they have not by their own act canceled the obligation under which the Government lay to them.

Mr. WOLFORD. How can they have done that, when, as I have said, every man has earned more than twice his weight in gold, if you count the dollars and cents they have given to the United States? You have taken what they got by their valor. You may call it plunder, if you please, but even if you take it as plunder it is in your Treasury. You have in your Treasury many millions of money as the result of that war, and you have many millions of swarming population inhabiting that land that they got for you. And I ask you, how could they forfeit their title to compensation?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that the time for which he asked the indulgence of the House, fifteen minutes, has expired.

Mr. WOLFORD. I want to talk a little further about that hereafter, but I will stop right here now. But I repeat sir, they could not forfeit it. I know your meaning. I know you mean that the poor fellows who fought in the Mexican war and afterward happened to go with the South, where they lived, ought not to be pensioned. I will talk about that another time. I will skip it now, but before I stop I will say I believe they ought to be pensioned.

Mr. PRICE. And I believe they ought not.

Mr. WOLFORD. There is another compensation that we can make to the South that will help to put them on an equal footing with the rest of the country. We can vote for this Blair bill and help to educate the children. A great deal of that money will go to the South; my own State will get some of it [laughter], and it will do a great deal of good in the Southern country; for if you take the poor and the lowly and the ignorant, that were considered once unworthy to be citizens, but are now citizens, and educate them, you will make them more capable of voting, of thinking, of managing their affairs, and you will elevate them in every way. The advantage that the South will get from that, and also from the circulation of the money there, will help to compensate the people for their disadvantages in other respects.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] has expired.

Mr. BRADY. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. WOLFORD. I do not want to say another word now, but I will pursue this subject another time.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Are you in favor of a service pension for Union soldiers?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir, I am. I was coming to that, but I will take that up on another occasion. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment submitted by the committee at the time the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] took the floor.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WINANS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, having had under consideration, pursuant to order, sundry bills on the Private Calendar, had instructed him to report the same back to the House with various recommendations.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have House bill 1504, granting a pension to John W. Rose, which was passed over informally in Committee of the Whole, recommitted for further investigation.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Whereas the problem of alleviating the distress everywhere prevalent among the laboring classes of the civilized world is universally considered the most important question of the hour—a problem that has demanded and received the immediate attention of the leading governments of Europe; and

Whereas, owing to the displacement of labor by the invention of labor-saving machinery and to laws which foster monopoly and divide society into two hostile classes, namely, the real rich and the real poor, the condition of the laboring people of this Republic is in many respects worse than in the countries of Europe—so deplorable in fact that the bureau of labor statistics of the State of Illinois in its official report for the year 1882 declares as an indisputable deduction from carefully compiled statistics that the average earnings of the heads of families for the entire list of occupations is less than the general average of the cost of living—a condition of hopeless destitution and relentless poverty that demands the immediate attention of the National Government: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the laboring men of America in the lodges of the Knights of Labor assembled, That we who labor in fair weather and in foul and contribute daily and willingly to the wealth of others and of the world are at least entitled to an opportunity of securing food for our children, the ordinary comforts of life, and a fair expectation of shelter and repose for our declining years.

Resolved, That in time of depression the General Government should make liberal appropriations of the surplus revenue for the construction of works of internal improvement and of national importance, and redistribute among the people in the form of wages funds hoarded in the vaults of the Treasury that have been taken from the people by taxation on what they eat and on what they wear.

Resolved, That we heartily indorse the plan for the construction of the Hennepin Canal by the General Government as an undertaking of national importance and necessity, an improvement that will not only benefit thousands of needy men pending the construction, but one that will furnish employment for all time to come to thousands engaged in a vast system of internal water traffic between New Orleans, Saint Paul, and New York; that will present an insurmountable check to the greed of monopolies; that will give cheaper bread to the East and cheaper goods to the West; that will stimulate commerce, industry, and agriculture everywhere in this great Republic.

Resolved, That our Representatives in Congress are hereby urged to consider this and like projects, questions of paramount and immediate importance, and to act in accordance with the spirit of these resolutions.

We hereby certify that the foregoing is a correct copy of resolutions adopted by the L. A. No. 4900 of the Knights of Labor of the county of Macon, and State of Illinois.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. E. T. Lippincott and 41 other residents of Orion, Henry County, Illinois, praying for the submission of a constitutional amendment extending the right of suffrage to women; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of residents of the Cœur d'Alene mining region, in Idaho Territory, remonstrating against the annexation of the northern part of Idaho to Washington Territory, and praying that that portion of Idaho may be annexed to Montana Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Peru, Ill.; a petition of Local Assembly No. 2913, Knights of Labor, of Alton, Ill., and a petition of Golden Rule Assembly No. 1959, Knights of Labor, of Quincy, Ill., praying for the restoration of wages in the Government Printing Office to the price formerly paid; which were referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a communication from the Young Republican Club of Lake, in the county of Cook, Illinois, calling attention to the dangers to this Government of allowing the acquisition of large tracts of land in this country by non-resident aliens, and insisting that lands in the United States should be held for American settlers. This I think is a very well prepared paper, and as it is brief I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The paper was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE YOUNG REPUBLICAN CLUB OF LAKE,
February 16, 1886.

SIR: The rapid absorption of the public domain of the United States by the acquisition and occupation of a large portion of it by non-resident aliens furnishes occasion for much anxiety to the people.

A few years ago the citizen settler had little difficulty in acquiring fertile and desirable lands for actual settlement, and there were homes for multitudes besides. Within a recent period the conditions have changed. Large quantities of the public lands have been acquired by non-resident aliens as individuals or in syndicates, and nearly all of what remains for American settlers is either arid or difficult of access. This condition of affairs seems to require a remedy. The remainder of the public lands should be preserved from the encroachment of aliens whose birth and education create and foster sentiments inimical to the country from which they are attempting to derive wealth to maintain an aristocratic splendor in their own countries. It may happen that the nation which failed to conquer us with its arms may yet prevail with its treasure.

The history of our own and of all countries, which have been conspicuous for the grandeur of their national life, has shown most emphatically that the public domain whose title is vested in and held by the Government as the visible organization of the nation, is the God-given property of the people. It can not, then, be alienated either by loss or misappropriation, whether by the sword or the money of aliens, except at imminent peril to the peace and, eventually, to the unity and life of the nation. Our land in its entirety on which the nation has lived, fought, and bled is a sacred heritage, and is to be, we trust, transmitted in its integrity to posterity with the same unfailing care with which we hand down the records of the glories of the fathers of the Republic. A glorious deed and the field upon which it was achieved should alike be the cherished possession of its people.

The public lands have not been regarded as a source of revenue to the Government. Hence, the policy of regarding the public domain as a trust, to be held by the central power for the benefit of actual settlers, who by making homes on these lands would eventually develop deserted tracts into populous and fertile States, is, we think, an enlightened policy, which accords with the instincts of national life and tends to avert from the people of our country that economic bondage in which the masses of other countries seem to be hopelessly involved. We can not think that the land which, if properly disposed of, would be peopled by a hardy and laborious race who in peace would be producers or consumers and in war defenders of the State, is put to good purpose when controlled by aliens, who suffer it to remain untilled or use it merely as a ranging-ground for cattle. The evil of large land-holding is unquestionably great, when the land-holder is an American; but to what extent is it intensified when the proprietor is an alien imbued with many of the barbarous ideas of feudal polity?

At its last regular meeting the Young Republicans of Lake discussed the question: "Resolved, That the holding of lands by aliens is detrimental to the best interest and welfare of the people of the United States;" and it was decided unanimously in the affirmative.

The undersigned were directed to communicate this to you. We are informed that there are measures pending in Congress designed to redress these evils as far as may be done by that body, having regard for vested rights and reciprocal treaty obligations. We ask your earnest consideration of these measures and, if possible, your support. As constituents, and on behalf of the Young Republican Club of Lake, we respectfully request an expression of your opinion.

Respectfully submitted.

HENRY R. NEELY,
EDWARD MAHER,
FRANK D. THOMASON,
Committee representing Young Republican Club of Lake.

To Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM, Senate.

He also presented the petition of Martha A. Clark and 29 other ladies of Rosendale, Wis., praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the disfranchisement of any citizen on the ground of sex; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, praying for the passage of the interstate-commerce bill and suggesting certain amendments thereto; which was referred to the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the League Island Mutual Protective Association of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enforcement of the eight-hour law; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the local assembly of Knights of Labor of Locust Dale, Pa., praying that an increase of wages be granted employés of the Government Printing Office; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of Local Assembly No. 3500, Knights of Labor, of South Bend, Ind., praying Congress to organize a Territorial form of government for the Indian Territory and to open the unoccupied lands to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Kokomo monthly meeting of Friends, Howard County, Indiana, and pastors of the different churches at that place, praying Congress to pass the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MAXEY presented a petition of citizens of Texarkana, Tex., praying for the establishment of a Federal court at that place; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I present a petition numerously signed by citizens of the District of Columbia residing on square 725.

I take occasion on presenting their petition to allude to the fact that the citizens of Washington are almost remediless in regard to the grievances which they may suffer from time to time in this city. This petition shows that as far back as 1878, to accommodate certain contractors, they were allowed to sink an alley from 10 to 12 feet below the surface of the adjoining lots, and that has kept a pool of refuse matter and water, making it dangerous to the lives of those in the neighborhood. It has been reported by the board of health as dangerous to the lives of the citizens residing in that portion of the city; and deaths have resulted from typhoid fever which the board of health say was a result from the alley being suffered to remain in this position. The petitioners have appealed from time to time to the District commissioners. They say:

That as early as 1878 your petitioners requested the District commissioners to abate the nuisance; that in 1880 and 1881 the health officer officially condemned said alley as a nuisance injurious to the public health; that after a personal examination by Commissioner Morgan the commissioners promised to fix the alley, but Major Twining dying soon after, nothing was done.

Your petitioners further show that during the past year the commissioners have permitted the erection of twenty negro tenement-houses without any sewer or means of drainage, and that all the slops and filth from the two or three hundred negroes and Italians, added to that from those already there, runs into said stagnant pool, so that during the past summer the stench was terrible; that it was again condemned by the health officer, and that subsequently it became so bad that he made a special report to the commissioners and insisted that it should be abated without delay, but that nothing has been done about it to this day.

Your petitioners have reason to fear still more serious results from this cause during the ensuing season, and more especially so if, as alleged by medical men, the cholera shall visit us.

For this long time these people have been subjected to this nuisance which has become an outrage, because really they have no tribunal that they can reach and by which they can be effectively heard. They have no legislative power anywhere except when Congress can pause long enough to consider their wants and wishes. There is no government provided for this people, there is no right of suffrage to this people in regard to the lowest offices which may affect them. They are stripped far more even than the Mormons are, upon whom Congress seeks to visit its displeasure from time to time, and I do trust that this appeal will now be heard.

Two distinguished Senators stated the other night at a meeting of newsboys that all the citizens of Washington had to do was to stretch forth their hands and appeal to Congress and Congress would rush in and do all they asked. Those statements were made in good faith, but they must have been rather startling when placed side by side with the experience of the citizens of this District. They have very much more to do than only to appeal or mildly stretch forth their hands and ask, because on very many matters I think every Senator will know, if his experience in the Senate does not go back too far, that they have petitioned year after year and year after year for the same subject-matter, and they have been thrust aside without any heed apparently being paid to them.

I trust now that this request for the health of that section of the city will be listened to by Congress. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial asking for light-house and fog-bell and buoys in San Juan Archipelago.

To the honorable the United States Light-House Board:

Your petitioners, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington in session assembled, would most respectfully represent that the commerce of the district of Puget Sound is rapidly increasing; that the islands in the San Juan Archipelago in said district are being thickly settled; that commerce of increasing importance is carried on between said group of islands and points on the main land in said district of Puget Sound; that the channels between and about said islands are rock-bound and dangerous to navigation; that the United States mails are now carried through said channels by steam twice a week and return; that bids are now being advertised for carrying mails over said route and through said channels six times per week and return; that the safety to commerce and of the mails demands that a light, with a fog-bell, be erected at the entrance from the south of the San Juan passage in said group. Also that a bell-buoy be placed on Pacific Rock, in San Juan Harbor; one on Turn Rock, near Friday Harbor, and one on Cypress Reef. Also that buoys at Lopez and Semiahmoo Harbors would greatly promote the interest of commerce and would add much to the safety of navigation on said route. Your petitioners, therefore, would most respectfully and earnestly urge upon your honorable body the necessity of said light, fog-bell, and buoys, and request that they be placed in position at as early a day as possible. And your petitioners will ever pray.

Passed the house of representatives January 23, 1886.
R. O. DUNBAR, Speaker of the House.

Passed the council January 25, 1886.

I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of sundry citizens of Avilla, in Jasper County, Missouri, praying Congress that the coinage of silver be placed on an equality with the coinage of gold; that the coin certificate system be continued, and so modified as to authorize their issue in denominations of one, two, and five dollars and upward; and that the same be made lawful money and legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, hereafter contracted within the United States; and demanding the reissue of the one and two dollar legal-tender notes, and that their volume be regulated so as to meet the public needs; and that the public debt be liquidated as rapidly as the revenues of the Government will permit, to the end that no useless, unnecessary, or idle surplus may remain hoarded in the Treasury. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of citizens of Iowa and other States, representing that there is in Northwestern Iowa a tract of land called the "Unearned Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad land grant," comprising 85,457 acres of land, the greater portion of which lies in O'Brien County, and which lands were, some years since, declared by Commissioner McFarland and Secretary Teller to be public lands. Citizens from nearly every county in Iowa, and also from other States, settled upon the lands, believing the statements of those officials, and there remained for years, investing all their means in improving their homes. They earnestly request Congress to protect the hundreds of settlers now on those lands by an act of absolute forfeiture. As the bill has been reported, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM presented a memorial of citizens of North Carolina, remonstrating against the passage of any bill preventing the catching of menhaden; which was referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

Mr. CALL. I have had a communication sent to me, being in the nature of a petition to the Senate, signed by J. K. Liles, of Fort Ogden, Fla., in reference to a resolution which was submitted by me in December last, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The petition states that the people of Manatee County, Florida, have been deprived of their homesteads throughout the entire extent of the county by selections made, under the authority of the United States, of swamp and overflowed lands. It also states that these selections have been made in some cases by agents of the United States through corrupt motives and under the influence of bribes offered to them, and it prays such action on the part of Congress as may protect the settlers in their homesteads. This petition also states that in many cases where settlers had lived out the term required by the homestead laws with the exception of a few months they have been deprived of those homesteads after labor put upon them by selections unlawfully made of land which was not swamp and overflowed, and in violation of the swamp and overflowed land grant.

FORT OGDEN, FLORIDA, February 12, 1886.

SIR: I am in receipt of a letter from S. M. Stockslager, assistant land commissioner, and he says: "In reply to yours making inquiry in regard to certain lands claimed under the swamp grant in township 45 south, range 20 east, and township 44 south, range 20 east, Florida," &c.

Senator, the people here never knew before that these lands were claimed under the swamp act, nor neither did they know until very recently that the Government lands on Pine Island were claimed under the same act. We knew by advices from the Gainesville office that our homesteads all over the mainland of Manatee County were selected by the State under the swamp act, not even respecting the duplicate homestead papers of our people, where they only lacked a short time of having lived out their five years, but swept the country (from the maps) of all the Government land there was left on the 13th of June, 1885.

Senator, one of the best men in this country told me the other day that the State agent offered Mr. John Bright, of Pine Island, and others the sum of $50 and $100 for their affidavits that Pine Island was swamp and overflowed. My homestead was selected by the State at the same time, and I have just come from Gainesville on contest business against the State; and I represented over a hundred settlers who were in the same fix. The Gainsville office promised me the appointment of W. H. Simmons, at Fort Ogden, as special commissioner to investigate our cases, but he has not received his commission yet. And when I was at Gainesville the land officers there said you had been raising "hell" in Washington over the matter, and that it was a "damned nuisance;" that you had the Washington folks thinking that they, the land officers at Gainesville, wanted our lands. Senator, you have struck the key-note at last, your name is in all mouths, and what we want you to do (and I speak the sentiments of the people who sent you there and who can send you again) is to forbid the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of any of the selections of June 13, 1885. That office has a special commissioner, one J. W. Childs, who is owned and controlled by Kreamer of the Okeechobee Drainage Company, and the Florida Southern Railroad. He has turned over land to the State that was claimed by actual settlers that had not a foot of swamp or overflowed ground.

Senator, I am quite a young man, and I have seen the poor settlers of this country who had their homes and little farms, as they thought, safe and under the protection of our Government, have to pay the agents of S. J. Wailes, Hamilton Disston, and the various railroads and other corporations from $2.50 to $25 per acre for their homes.

Senator, the day of judgment is fast approaching; the time of wrath is now at hand; the people in this section are raging over the wrongs they have sustained, and we shall from this time on hold our Senators and Representatives responsible.

Senator, there are numbers of people so ignorant they do not know what steps to take to save their homes, and they are being patented to the State, as the Department of Interior says, "because no conflicting reports are had in that office.

Senator Wilkinson Call, we demand of you to make a conflicting report in regard to the whole of the selections of June 13, 1885.

Respectfully,

J. K. LILES.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1471) to remove the charge of desertion from the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army against certain soldiers, to report the bill to the Senate favorably and recommend its passage; and I give notice that at an early day I shall call the bill up and ask action upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. There was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (S. 625) for the relief of Louis Garon, jr., from the charge of desertion. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] who introduced the bill. The committee instruct me to report the bill back adversely, recommending that it be indefinitely postponed and that the claim intended to be presented therein be not allowed. The general law passed on the 5th of July, 1884, affords ample remedy for this kind of a case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I ask that it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 271) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John H. Mitchell, a bill introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], have instructed me to report adversely, recommending that the bill be indefinitely postponed. The Secretary of War sent the original papers to your committee and they examined them, and all the letters there were letters from the claimant himself and two from his brother, showing no sufficient ground for the relief sought. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred petitions of citizens of Wichita and of Lecompton, Kans., praying for legislation opening to settlement the unoccupied lands in the Indian Territory and the establishment of a Territorial government therein, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STANFORD introduced a bill (S. 1605) to establish a quarantine station at the port of San Francisco; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS introduced a bill (S. 1606) to facilitate the administration of the laws in the Territory of Alaska; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It only provides for the giving of bonds before district judges in the States from which appointees come, as there are no means of their giving their bonds in the Territory of Alaska as the law seems now to require. The bill should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 1607) granting an increase of pension to James E. B. Dalzell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SAWYER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1608) for the relief of Robert C. Murphy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1609) to authorize the use of the proceeds of the sinking fund created by the act of June 8, 1878, known as the Thurman act, in the construction and equipment of branch railroad and telegraph lines; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1610) granting a pension to Margaret Houts; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER, it was

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the order will be entered and the motion to reconsider will be withdrawn.

ANDREWS'S PORTRAIT OF JEFFERSON.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of purchasing for the Government, to be placed in the Department of State, the life-size portrait of Thomas Jefferson painted by E. F. Andrews.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolutions; which were read:

Whereas a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary have originated and reported to the Senate and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof;"

And whereas the Senate, if said resolution is adopted as being true upon the facts and as matter of law, will thereby announce the prejudgment of a majority of this body, without any trial according to law, that the Attorney-General of the United States is guilty of and condemned for having willfully committed an offense in the conduct of his office which is in violation of his official duty and is subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government of the United States; and

Whereas the Attorney-General, if he has in fact willfully committed any offense that is in violation of his official duty and is subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government of the United States, is only amenable to the condemnation of the Senate when the Senate is sitting, with the Chief-Justice of the United States, as a court of impeachment to hear and decide upon articles of impeachment presented by the House of Representatives; and

Whereas it is alleged that the Senate has no rightful authority to cause the Attorney-General of the United States to be arrested, tried, and punished for a contempt of its authority and dignity, if the Senate shall declare that such contempt has been committed by him upon the facts stated and the averments made in said resolution and in the report which accompanies the same;

Whereas the Senate would be exposed to just censure if they, in the manner recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, proceed to announce their judgment of condemnation against the Attorney-General of the United States upon an accusation that includes an offense which is punishable by impeachment; and

Whereas, the Senate would also be exposed to just censure if it should attempt to declare the Attorney-General to be in contempt of its authority, and to pass judgment of condemnation against him for such contempt without having him notified of the charge and arraigned to answer the same at the bar of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to inquire into and report upon the question whether the offense alleged against the Attorney-General of the United States in said resolution is of the class of offenses for which the head of a Department may be impeached and removed from office, and whether the Senate can take jurisdiction of said alleged offense in the manner provided for in said resolution, and can proceed to convict and condemn the Attorney-General in advance of a trial for said alleged offense by a resolution of the Senate, there being no impeachment of said officer in the mode required by the Constitution.

2. That said committee be instructed to further inquire and report whether the Senate has the power under the law and the rules adopted for its government to arrest, try, convict, and punish the Attorney-General of the United States for a contempt of its rightful authority.

3. That said committee be further instructed to inquire and report whether the matters stated and referred to in the manner set forth in the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary above copied constitute any crime or any misdemeanor in office under any law of the United States; and, if so, what penalty is annexed to said crime or misdemeanor, and what tribunal has the rightful jurisdiction to try and, on conviction, to condemn the Attorney-General of the United States to punishment for the same.

4. That said committee be further instructed to consider, ascertain, and report whether in the conduct of the Attorney-General, as stated in the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary and in the accompanying report, he violated any and what law of the United States, and in what respect he has violated said law; and whether he has done any and what act, in his conduct of the business of his office to which said resolution relates, that he might not have done in the exercise of his lawful discretion.

5. That said committee be further instructed to inquire and report whether the Senate has any constitutional right or power to give its advice and consent to removals from office by the President, and whether, by withholding such advice and consent, the Senate can prevent the removal of any person from office by the President.

6. That said committee inquire and report whether the Senate, if a majority shall agree to the resolution above recited (which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary), has the right, under the Constitution, to withhold its consent to the removal of persons by the President who are unfit for office, under the circumstances mentioned in said report of the Committee on the Judiciary and in the resolutions reported by said committee; and whether the Senate can bind its members by any declaration of the duty of the Senate, or by any rule, as a duty to the Senate, as the same is declared in the following resolution touching the powers and proper conduct of the Senate, which was also reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, namely:

"Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter."

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the resolutions be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

PEARSON C. MONTGOMERY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar is in order. The first case on the Calendar will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] who reported the bill desires to be present when it is discussed. I ask that it may retain its place on the Calendar and go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill goes over without prejudice, I understand.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes; it retains its place.

J. J. PULLIAM'S ESTATE.

The bill (S. 605) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased, was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and the Senate resumed its consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read on a former day. Are there any amendments to be offered to it as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HOAR. The report also has been read. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] made some objection, and I understand an amendment has been prepared to the bill which meets his approbation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. I submit a preamble to the bill, which relieves the objection which the Senator from Kansas had to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed preamble will be read for information only at this time.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas under the provisions of the act of June 16, 1864, certain claims were allowed and reported to Congress by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department in 1882 for payment, including the claim of J. J. Pulliam's estate for wood supplied to the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army; and whereas there was a mistake in the amount that should have been reported in favor of said Pulliam's estate, as appears by the report of the committee to whom said bill was referred, made before the passage thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the preamble submitted by the Senator from Tennessee.

The preamble was agreed to.

L. MADISON DAY.

The bill (S. 266) for the relief of L. Madison Day was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That goes over. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] is not present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the bill to go over without prejudice or to be passed over under the rule?

Mr. COCKRELL. Just let it go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes, was the next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. DAWES], who has in charge the bill, has gone home to attend the funeral of a friend, and I should like to have the bill go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. TELLER. Before the bill goes over I desire to offer an amendment to it and to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 1 add the following proviso:

Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, allow homestead settlement by citizens of the United States on each alternate quarter-section under such rules and regulations as shall secure to the Indians their allotments as herein provided for and a proper enforcement of the intercourse laws; and for all land so taken for homesteads by citizens of the United States there shall be proper compensation made to the Indians owning such land under treaty stipulations by act of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be printed, and the bill will go over without being displaced.

PAYMENT OF A DRAFT.

The joint resolution (S. R. 26) relative to a certain accepted draft in the Department of State was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of State to deliver to the person justly entitled to the possession thereof one draft for the sum of $8,950, dated New York, August 19, 1859, and drawn by Santiago Vidaurri, governor of Nuevo Leon and Coahuila, by Ignacio Galindo, on J. M. Mata, Mexican minister, Washington, D. C., and accepted by Mata, and made payable at the Bank of the Republic, New York, the same having been deposited in the Department by error. But a copy of the draft, with all the indorsements and protests, if any, thereon, shall be retained by the Secretary of State.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the form be changed so that it be a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. INGALLS. Unless the Senator reporting the bill has some special reason why it should be retained as a joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was sent in this form from the State Department. That was the only reason.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I suggest that the change in the frame be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the joint resolution will be changed into a bill.

The joint resolution was changed to a bill (S. 1621) relative to a certain accepted draft in the Department of State.

The bill was read three times and passed.

MONUMENT TO GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, if there be no objection, to call up the bill for the erection of a monument to the late Ulysses S. Grant. If any member of the Senate desires any further time I shall not press the motion, but I suppose it will be unanimously the desire of the Senate to pass the bill. [A pause.] I move that the Senate take up the bill (S. 1564) for the erection of a monument to the late Ulysses S. Grant.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no doubt the bill will pass, but I want to say that I think it ought not to pass, and I am sure that I only voice what I believe would be the sentiment of the great soldier whose name is mentioned therein, were he alive, when I say that a monument is not needed to perpetuate his fame, and that he would not, if he were here to express an opinion on the subject, desire that it should be erected.

There is to be erected in the city of New York, at the expense of the people of that city and of such other persons as may contribute thereto, a monument over the place where the body of General Grant rests, the place where, according to all the testimony we have on the subject, he desired to be buried and where he was buried.

If his fame rests upon any such insubstantial foundation as a monument to cost $250,000, or any other sum, then it will perish long before history ceases to recount the deeds which made him famous. If he was the man whom we believe him to have been, and if his connection with the most important epoch of this country has the significance which we attribute to it, his fame is more secure without a monument than with it.

Mr. President, it is no disparagement to General Grant to say that he was preceded by a greater man, in a measure also the creation of the epoch which brought General Grant his fame. That man was Abraham Lincoln. I am not aware that Congress has paused in the transaction of its business or put its hand into the public Treasury to erect any monument to him. To do so would be unnecessary. Mr. Lincoln's memory would be no more safe with a great monument than without one, and I take it that it is an appreciation of that fact which has induced the American people to forego the appropriation of a sum of money out of the national Treasury for the purpose of erecting such a monument.

Similarly, I believe that the memory of General Grant is safe. He was as great a man in his way as Mr. Lincoln was in his, and I have no doubt that if he could be consulted he would ask for no better honor than that he might go down to posterity along with Mr. Lincoln, with no monument erected to him in Washington or elsewhere.

It is easy, of course, to take the money out of the public Treasury for a purpose of this kind, for the gratification of a momentary sentiment, and I do not speak with any disrespect of the sentiment which prompts this bill; but the people of this country are amply able to build a monument, and if the sentiment toward General Grant was of the kind that could be voiced in a monument, a monument would be built by private contributions. But the sentiment toward General Grant, as that toward Mr. Lincoln, is deeper, more profound, and more tender than could ever find expression in a law of the United States or in any monument of marble or any other material, built here or elsewhere. I would not detract from his fame by doing this, but I would let the monument to be erected at the point where he was buried be the single evidence of that kind of expression of good will or good feeling or whatever else it may be called that he is held in by the people of the United States.

No law we can pass expresses any kind of sentiment except perhaps the indifference that we have to a certain extent in regard to the public funds, as is manifested by much of the legislation that we pass here. Therefore this is merely idle as an expression that is in any way valuable as testifying the sense of obligation or of respect or of kindliness of the people of the United States toward the memory of General Grant.

We have done many things that I think were not proper to be done in this same direction. I might be willing to agree that we would make such appropriation should any member of the family of General Grant ever come to want; I might be willing to go further, and agree that no member of the family of any President of the United States should ever come to want; but we have come to consider the giving of money as the highest evidence of regard, and give money where money is not needed. There are obligations which can be responded to only with money, which this nation incurred to those who defended it in its hour of peril. The widows of the men whom General Grant commanded, of the men who made the victories of Donelson and Vicksburg and Missionary Ridge and the Wilderness and Appomattox possible, scattered all over this broad land, in the busy haunts of men, on homesteads, on the remote frontier, are among the people whom the Government of the United States owes money to and which it doles out with a scanty hand; little pensions of $8 a month to the widows of private soldiers whose necessities are just as great as the widows of Presidents or generals of the Army. We can not pause in the exercise of our ordinary duties here to do the graceful and the honorable and the just and the legal thing for them; but if there is any proposition to vote a pension to somebody who does not need it, or to build a monument which is not necessary as the expression of the national regard, then we can stop and drop our Calendar and take this up to the exclusion of everything else.

As I said, the bill will pass. I have no doubt it will. It will become a law. I want simply to record my protest against it, as one who, I think, cherishes just as much the memory of General Grant as a soldier, as a statesman, and, above all, as a man as any person on this floor or elsewhere; and I say that that feeling which I have, and which will descend through my blood as it will descend through the blood of all the American people through all coming time, will find no fitting expression in any monument erected by statute here or elsewhere. General Grant's monument is in the hearts of the American people.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have heard that there is in the French Academy a bust of the most famous dramatist of France who was not a member of that body in his lifetime, and under it the inscription: "Nothing is wanting to his fame; he is wanting to ours." I think that if in future time the American citizen from any part of this country, from any part of the continent which may then be included within our borders visits the seat of Government, if he shall look in vain for an expression of the gratitude and honor of the American people to Ulysses S. Grant he will repeat with sorrow and shame the sentiment of the French scholars, "Nothing is wanting to his fame, but something is wanting to ours."

I had not intended to speak upon this subject. I did not suppose that it would be necessary to urge the Senate to do what I am quite sure will, with the exception of my honorable friend from Kansas, be done by its unanimous voice.

I appreciate the spirit and I appreciate the independence which has led the honorable Senator to express the sentiments which he feels. I am sure that he yields to no other Senator and to no other citizen in his reverence for the great memory which this bill is intended to honor, and that it is only a difference of opinion with the general mass of his countrymen in regard to the value and appropriateness of this particular method alone which animates that able and patriotic Senator. But it seems to me that we must take this thing as settled by the general judgment of mankind, that civilized nations are wanting in due and decent honor for their great benefactors unless by monument or statuary, or in some other public way, they put up in their public places the tokens of their regard.

The English and the continental cities, as every traveler knows, are crowded; there is not a public square in Europe from which there does not look down from lofty pedestal the image of some man who has done good fighting in great wars, or who has been a public leader and benefactor in the paths of statesmanship, in administration, in peace. Napoleon was commemorated by a thousand monuments. The statues of Wellington and of Marlborough are found in almost every principal city in Great Britain.

Here we have a man to whom, with the single exception of Washington alone in modern history, belongs the double wreath, the double crown of being foremost in the great war on which the life of his country depended and foremost in the statesmanship of a great age in which the character and the future history of his country were alike dependent.

General Grant also has another claim to the gratitude of this entire people. He represents more than any other single man, either in war or peace, that sublime clemency which at the close of this mighty death-struggle sent home restored to citizenship, to equality, to all the rights and privileges of an American, every one who had espoused the conquered cause. I do not think there can be found in the history of the world from the earliest preserved record to this hour an instance of a great civil strife succeeded by such a sublime, noble, and magnanimous clemency. That, of course, like the subjugation of the rebellion, like the civil policy which followed the subjugation of the rebellion, was the act of the American people. It is not due to any one man or to any number of individual leaders, but none the less was President Grant its foremost representative and example; and it is the one thing which future ages will contemplate with admiration and regard when they look back to this history of ours. There have been great wars, there have been great civil periods, there have been great achievements on the field of battle and in the senate-house, and there will be other great wars and great acts of statesmanship and of civil administration; but there never has been and I do not believe that for ages to come, in the present condition of the civilized world, there ever will be again repeated such an instance of sublime, noble, and heroic magnanimity.

Now, Mr. President, it is impossible to reward, as we should be glad to reward and as he deserves to be rewarded, every soldier or every officer or every general by public commemoration, by public generosity. We must for these purposes select the representatives, and when the monument to Ulysses S. Grant is erected at the seat of the Government of the country, every soldier throughout the land, every Union and patriotic soldier, will say, "That honor is mine also." Every citizen who joined in the policy of forbearance and clemency and generosity will say, "In honoring him you have conferred an honor also which is reflected in some humble measure upon me."

I think there is not a private soldier within the length and breadth of this land who would not feel almost a sense of personal outrage and indignity if he should miss or his neighbors or children should miss when they come to Washington some fitting memorial of the great President. There will be others, there are others now, who will deserve a place in that companionship. The images of other great generals of the war who have gone to their reward have already been erected in our chief squares and others will sooner or later take their place. The nation will—I hope it will be a long time—but the nation will seek also among these images to erect one to manifest its honor and regard for a member of this body not now in his seat, who more than any other single man is the representative of the character of the volunteer soldier, who is to-day the foremost living volunteer soldier who served in this great struggle. I do not think when the time comes for such a memorial, distant as we all hope it will be, that there will be from any quarter of the country, North or South, the voice of any soldier raised in opposition to that act of public gratitude.

Mr. President, this policy, it seems to me, with due respect to my honorable friend from Kansas, must be taken as settled, as the judgment, the taste, the desire, the demand of the American people, as it is of all other peoples. We erect monuments on every great field of battle of the Revolution or of the late war, not because the little structure of stone or bronze or brass is needed that the people of the United States should remember Yorktown or Saratoga or Bunker Hill or Concord, but it is because in that way by the universal instincts of humanity these feelings are expressed and these feelings are preserved to other ages.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator might as well say, or some other Senator might as well say, that his taste or judgment did not approve the funeral ceremonial, the wearing of mourning, or the religious service, or the dirge, or the gathering neighbors, with which the instincts of all civilized people mark the funeral of a friend who dies. A great deal can be said in the way of reason about the waste, that you had better have sold it for a thousand pence and given it to the poor, but the answer is that this is the method by which universal humanity seeks not to pay its debt to the dead, but to do justice to the sentiment and the affection of the living.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, one thing is certain, that there never yet was a great nation that neglected its great dead; and my opposition to this bill, if I were to oppose it, would not be made upon the fact that there is to be a contribution of $250,000 in money to the erection of a monument to honor the memory of our dead general and President, but that the amount is too parsimonious, too small. I think it is unworthy so great a nation that we should appropriate to the erection in the capital of a monument at an expense of not more than one-fourth the amount that is to be expended in our metropolitan city for the same purpose. I think that it is hardly commensurate with the due magnificence of that memorial and tribute which we pay to General Grant that we should limit the amount of the expenditure to the paltry quarter million dollars that is provided for in this bill.

But there is another reason why I would object to the passage of this bill in its present form; and that is this: No reason can be given for commemorating the name of General Grant that can not be given as strongly why this nation should erect a suitable monument in this her capital city to the commemoration of the virtues and patriotism of the dead Lincoln also. It is now more than twenty years since he died; and Congress has forgotten, although the nation may not have forgotten, this great duty which should be discharged ere we enter upon the commemoration of the memory of Grant.

I am in favor of discharging both these duties now. I think that the committee, instead of reporting this bill alone, should have reported some measure for the erection of a due memorial, a proper monument, to the memory of Lincoln in this city. It is true that we have one, one which is a discredit alike to the memory of the dead and to the generosity of the nation, a monument which I venture to say would not to-day as a work of art sell for $25 if it were offered to free and open competition in the marts of the world.

While I shall not oppose the passage of this bill, I hope that the committee themselves will take into consideration the question whether it should not be recommitted, whether they should not provide for the erection of some suitable testimonial of the nation's gratitude to these two great Presidents who must for all time stand upon the same high level which is now occupied by the unapproachable Washington himself. I hope the committee will consider this question. I hope the Senator who is pressing this bill will recall the virtues and the services of Lincoln, and himself ask that the bill be recommitted, and that something come to the Senate and go to the House which will be, to a certain extent at least, consonant with the wishes of the American people as to what should be done to give appropriate commemoration to these two great men.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me for suggesting that the committee will consider that matter in the same spirit that the Senator has manifested, of a proper memorial to Mr. Lincoln, and I think the committee would all be of opinion—I am sure I should—that it belittles both to undertake to have them united in anything which would give the appearance of log-rolling. Each of these things must stand as one single and sincere action.

Mr. BLAIR. I should be entirely indifferent as to which was done first, provided both were done by the present Congress. It did not occur to me that any mortal being would consider a proposition of this kind in connection with any discreditable log-rolling. But I do think that the committee should consider whether the amount with which they propose to erect this memorial to Grant is sufficient. Is it suitable that the American nation in the exhibition of its gratitude by a demonstration of this kind should be surpassed by what is expected to be done in the capital of one of our States or in the metropolitan city of our country? It seems to me that the monument to Grant, as well as the monument to Lincoln—at least the monument erected here in the capital city, should surpass all others as a tribute of the sentiment of the nation at large.

I did not rise to oppose the bill. I am only glad that there is some manifestation of a disposition to do something in this direction, and I hope, as I said before, that the committee will consider whether they have gone to the full extent of propriety and duty in this regard.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONVEYANCE OF AN ALLEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case regularly in order on the Calendar will be reported.

The bill (S. 1020) authorizing the District of Columbia to convey the alley, 15 feet wide, running east and west, between lots 6 and 7, in square 635, comprising an area of 3,480 square feet of land, to the owner of said lots, was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC LAND LAWS.

The bill (S. 1296) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber-culture, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLUMB. The hour of 2 o'clock has nearly arrived, and this bill I think will lead to debate. I think it is not the desire of the committee to have it considered now on account of some testimony in regard to it that is being taken. I ask that it lie over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). If there be no objection the bill will be informally passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

WILBUR F. STEELE.

The bill (S. 1223) for the relief of Wilbur F. Steele was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not want it to lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be informally passed over without losing its place on the Calendar.

ARKANSAS HOT SPRINGS.

The next business on the Calendar was the concurrent resolution reported by Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands February 1, 1886, against the renewal of the leases of bath-houses and hot-water privileges upon the Government lands at Hot Springs.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made the resolution goes over.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask that the resolution of my colleague go over, retaining its place on the Calendar. He is not here at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection that the resolution referred to by the Senator from Arkansas go over without prejudice and retain its place on the Calendar? The Chair hears none, and such is the order of the Senate.

STATUES TO COLUMBUS, LA FAYETTE, AND GARFIELD.

The joint resolution (S. R. 35) setting apart public reservations for statues to Columbus, Lafayette, and James A. Garfield was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who reported that measure, left the Chamber a short time since, saying that he was not feeling well enough to remain here to-day. I am quite sure he would wish to be heard on the resolution, and I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the resolution will go over, without losing its place on the Calendar.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The joint resolution (S. R. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women was announced as next in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Is there no report from the committee?

Mr. BLAIR. That is a very important matter, probably the most important on the Calendar, and it can not be suitably discussed in the morning hour. I shall be obliged on that account, and for no other reason, to ask the indulgence of the Senate that it be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the resolution will be informally passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. The Chair hears no objection.

ALBERT H. EMERY.

Mr. HOAR. The next measure on the Calendar has passed the Senate several times, but it is quite important, and I think the Senate would desire to have it explained, and there is not quite time for that before 2 o'clock perhaps. So I should like to have it go over and retain its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the next bill on the Calendar, being the bill (S. 929) for the relief of Albert H. Emery, be informally passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. There being no objection, the bill is informally passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

FRANCIS GILBEAU.

The bill (S. 718) for the relief of Francis Gilbeau was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $2,600 to the legal representatives of Francis Gilbeau, deceased, in full of claims against the United States for the rent of houses belonging to Gilbeau and all damages to the same, in Galveston and San Antonio, Tex., during the years 1865 and 1866.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, February 2, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 718) for the relief of Francis Gilbeau, report thereon as follows:

The petition of claimant presents a claim for rent of certain buildings in San Antonio and Galveston, Tex., occupied by the United States Army for Army purposes in the years 1865 and 1866, amounting to $3,701.65, and itemized as follows:

(1) For rent of building and store at San Antonio, Tex., from August 24, 1865, to December 10, 1865, at $400 per month, as per certificate of Capt. H. S. Clubb	$1,432 22
(2) For rent of dwelling in San Antonio, Tex., from October 12 to December 31, 1865, at $100 per month	263 33
(3) For rent of same from January 1, 1866, to August 31, 1866, at $150 per month	1,200 00
(4) For rent of fire-proof building in Galveston from June 19, 1865, to August 28, 1865, at $350 per month, used by Captain Atwood, assistant quartermaster	806 17
Total	3,701 67

This claim has the following legislative history: In the Forty-fourth Congress, first session, a bill for $2,600 was reported favorably from this committee; in the Forty-sixth Congress a similar bill passed both Houses of Congress, but owing to delay failed to receive the signature of the President; in the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress it was again reported favorably from this committee and again passed the Senate, and in the Forty-eighth Congress, first session, like action was had in the Senate. At that session Mr. CAMERON, then chairman of this committee, submitted the following report, which, on a careful examination of the testimony submitted, your committee approves, and submits it as the report of this committee in support of the bill now under consideration.

Mr. Cameron's report is as follows:

"This claim is for the rent of certain buildings in San Antonio and Galveston, Tex., in the years 1865 and 1866, amounting to $3,701.67.

"The loyalty of the claimant is proven conclusively.

"The occupation of the building by officers of the United States Government for legitimate and necessary Army purposes is clearly proven, and contracts were entered into by which the claimant was to receive a reasonable rental.

"The demand for rent for the buildings in San Antonio was declared reasonable by a board of survey, consisting of officers of the Army. The claim was presented to the proper officers of the Treasury, but was rejected on the ground that the location of the building was in a State lately in rebellion, and they were prohibited by law from paying it. It was also presented to the Southern Claims Commission, and was rejected for want of jurisdiction.

"It appears from the certificate of Capt. Henry S. Clubb, assistant quartermaster and district quartermaster, that the United States Government rented a ten-room building in San Antonio of Mr. Guilbeau, on the 24th day of August, 1865, and returned possession of it to him on the 10th of December, 1865. It also appears that a board of survey, convened June 6, 1866, recommended that a rent be paid for the use of the same by the United States Government.

"It appears from the proceedings of a board of survey, composed of Army officers, convened on the 28th of August, 1866, that a rent of $400 per month was not 'too much' for the use of the storehouse then rented by Guilbeau to the Government.

"An affidavit of A. Fretelliere shows that he, as agent of Guilbeau, agreed with Capt. Henry S. Clubb, assistant quartermaster, that he (Fretelliere) was to receive $400 per month, or $4,000 per annum, for the rent of the above-mentioned store building.

"A letter from General S. K. Mizner shows that a dwelling-house of Guilbeau was occupied for military purposes by officers of the United States Army on the 12th of October, 1865, 'with a perfect understanding that a proper rent should be paid' by the United States Government.

"A certificate from General S. P. Heintzelman shows that the dwelling of Guilbeau was used as headquarters by General Shaw, and afterward by himself in like manner, and that Guilbeau was to receive $150 per month rent for the same, and that the building was thus occupied from the 9th day of May, 1865, to the 31st day of August of the same year.

"An affidavit of A. Fretelliere, agent of Guilbeau, shows that the dwelling was occupied on the 12th day of October, 1865, and from that time until the 1st day of September, 1866; that $100 per month was the rent agreed upon from October 12, 1865, to January 1, 1866, and from that day he was to receive $150 per month.

"An affidavit of James B. Nash, agent for Guilbeau, shows that the building known as Guilbeau's building, situated on lot No. 10, block No. 680, in Galveston, was occupied for Army purposes by Captain Atwood, assistant quartermaster, on the 9th day of June, 1865, and continued to be occupied until the 28th day of August 1865, and it was agreed that he was to be paid punctually by the Government. He states, further, that he never received any rent from the Government for the use of the building, and that the rent charged the Government was but little more than half the sum he received for it immediately after the vacation of the same by the Government.

"The affidavits of Messrs. William M. Varmell and James A. McKee show that Guilbeau was loyal to the United States Government during the war, and that he was compelled to leave his home in San Antonio because of his loyalty.

"Your committee are of opinion that $2,600 would be a fair compensation to make to claimant."

Your committee therefore report back S. bill 718 without amendment and recommend its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the bill read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move an amendment after the word "houses," in line 7, to insert the words "and other buildings." I see by the report that there were one or two buildings that might not come within the phraseology of "houses," and the committee evidently intend that the bill shall cover the whole case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7, after the word "houses," it is proposed to insert "and other buildings."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. This report, it seems to me, ought to be a little more full in some particulars in order to show the basis of this claim. It is stated here that a contract was entered into, but the report very carefully fails to state with whom that contract was made. It is a very singular thing if this contract was made by some person authorized to make it (and if it was not so made, really it was no contract at all) that it should not be set out here, and it is equally singular that, if it were made by a person authorized to make it, it was not paid in the usual way in which claims of that kind are paid. I do not speak of it as impeaching the character of this claim, but it seems to me that the report is silent where it ought to be expressive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We ought to know why it was not paid before.

Mr. PLUMB. It is stated here that the officers of the Treasury Department rejected it on the ground that the location of the buildings was in a State actually in rebellion, and that the Southern Claims Commission rejected it for want of jurisdiction. I never heard before, I think, of any claim being rejected by the Southern Claims Commission on account of any difficulty as to jurisdiction. I thought they had jurisdiction of everything under the sun that had reference to the rebellion.

Mr. JACKSON. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that the facts in the case are contained in the report. The quartermaster of that department made the contract and gave a voucher according to form No. 22, as it was called, for the rent agreed upon, after he had adjusted the claim by a proper reference. The reason it was not paid was that it was cut off by the act of February 20, 1867, which prevented the Treasury Department from paying such a claim that had originated in States that had been in insurrection, although it originated after hostilities had actually ceased.

Mr. PLUMB. That is a very important fact, but it is not set out in the report. I am speaking wholly of the lack of the report; and to show how indistinct this is, while it is stated in the first part of the report that a contract was made, and not by whom it was made, a letter is introduced here from General Mizner, who says this building was occupied "with a perfect understanding that a proper rent should be paid," which I do not think expresses the idea of a contract at all. It seems that it was a claim really, according to General Mizner, on a quantum meruit.

I do not care to object to the consideration of the bill, but it seems to me the report ought to have covered several points that it does not in order that we might know exactly the grounds on which the Committee on Claims proceeded and the theory on which the bill was to be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 20th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 241) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, as I can not vote for this educational bill, I desire to vindicate the opposition that I am compelle p by my convictions to make to a measure which is urged with so much zeal, sincerity, and ability on both sides of this Chamber. In doing so I shall not be deterred by the formidable array of so-called precedents that have been marshaled to support the constitutionality of the bill, or by the conflicting opinions of the fathers of the Constitution from giving the results of my own study of the question or the reasoning by which those results have been reached. In dealing with a question of such immense importance to the welfare of our country, so tremendous in its scope, so far-reaching in its consequences, we would be derelict to the high functions of American legislators were we to allow it to be decided for us by the real or supposed analogy of the cases (trivial in importance when compared with this) which in our past history have from time to time been acted upon by Congress, and thus abdicate the right and the duty to scrutinize and examine each for himself the Constitution from which all our powers are derived.

Precedents, however well established, the former practice of the Government however uniform, opinions of constitutional lawyers however concurring, though they may illustrate, illuminate, and inform, can never deprive the people who send us here of their right to have such questions decided, not by precedents, practices, or opinions, but by the conscience and intelligence of their representatives with all the aid that such precedent, practice, and opinion can give. In this sense no constitutional question can be called settled against the deliberate judgment of those who are lawfully charged with its determination.

But what are we to do in a case where there are no well-established precedents, where there is no uniform practice, and no consensus of authoritative opinions? Why, we can only turn to the open pages of the Constitution and there, whence all lawful authority, all legislative power must find its source, study its mandates, consider its restrictions, review its history, and commune with its spirit, and upon the judgment thus formed decide for ourselves for or against the constitutionality of this bill. I desire, sir, to make no other apology for approaching the question of the constitutionality of this measure, though I know, Mr. President, that in some respectable quarters constitutional discussion is made light of and treated as an outworn fashion of earlier days, something to make merry over, and those who indulge in it are called "political archæologists" and other hard names. And they are contrasted with a more robust school of statesmen, who are fond of posing as the representatives par excellence of the will of the people, their wants and their aspirations, which are always interpreted to suit the passing mood of such representatives.

Now, Mr. President, I recognize in this Constitution the highest and most authoritative expression of the people's will. They, the sovereign people, have ordained it as the supreme law of the land, and to that will so expressed I always bow in humble submission. They do not and never did intend that the notions or opinions of their servants here, however honestly they may be entertained, as to their wants or their welfare, shall override the plain lines of demarkation between the powers which they have granted and those which they have withheld.

And now, sir, what is proposed by this bill? Nothing other or less than to take from the pockets of the people by taxation $77,000,000, and apply it, under certain conditions prescribed by Congress, to the support of one of the municipal institutions of the States—their school system. This, to my mind, is a proposition more fraught with danger to our system of local self-government and more menancing to the just relations existing under the Constitution between the Federal Government and the States than any ever made in our history. The benevolent features of the bill and the respectable motives of those who advocate it do not allay my fears. Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.

It is absolutely without precedent in any proper sense of that term. There ought surely to be the clearest and most undeniable constitutional warrant for a measure so revolutionary and so radical.

We are referred by the friends of the measure to the first clause of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution as conferring upon Congress the authority requisite to enact this bill into a law—to what has come to be called in this debate "the general-welfare clause."

That clause reads as follows:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Here, it is conceded, the friends of the bill must find the constitutional warrant they seek or it can not be found at all.

Now in examining this clause, as all other clauses of the Constitution, in order to find what of legislative powers or governmental authorities they confer, it must be always remembered that the Federal Government as established by the Constitution in its three branches, legislative, executive, and judicial, was made the depositary by the States or the people of a specially described portion only of the governmental powers previously existing in the plenary sovereignty of these States.

The great residuum of governmental powers not thus specially deposited remained in the States and their peoples, so that it has become an axiom of American constitutional law that the Federal Government is one of enumerated and specially delegated powers, including, of course, those implied powers necessary to give efficiency to the others, and has no authority or power or jurisdiction not thus expressly conferred; while the State governments have a plenary sovereignty, power, and jurisdiction except where specially restrained or limited by their constitutions or that of the United States. It is not a waste of time to thus go back to the horn-books of constitutional law, because a careful consideration of the partition of power made between the common Federal Government and the States creating it will, I think, go far toward the solution of this question.

The powers and jurisdictions conferred upon this common agent, the Federal Government, were specific and enumerated, but plenary and complete; they are, and were meant to be, exclusive either in grant or in exercise. The powers and jurisdictions withheld by the States were likewise full and complete, so that there was never any occasion, as there never was any justification, for a joint exercise of governmental functions.

The terms in which these grants are made are general, and not particular, and merely the subject-matter of the jurisdiction and the general scope of the powers is indicated, thus leaving the largest and widest discretion in their exercise, and avoiding the danger of confining or trammeling the activities and energies of the Government which the Constitution created. The power in Congress to legislate is coextensive with the subject of the grant, but at the same time is limited by it.

Congress has the largest choice of means and methods when dealing with a subject committed to its jurisdiction, but it can not move one step in regard to matters and interests and concerns not committed to it by the Constitution. Within the domain of its granted authority it is all-powerful, but outside of it it is absolutely powerless. With the institutions of a State and the concerns of municipal government retained under State control Congress can in no wise meddle or interfere. Its energies are paralyzed when they are attempted to be exerted outside of the scope of its delegated powers.

No argument is necessary to enforce these plain propositions of constitutional law. Keeping in mind then these fundamental principles, and also the whole scheme of this Government of enumerated powers erected by the Constitution and the States with their residuum of undelegated powers, what do we gather as the plain meaning of the grant of legislative power contained in this eighth section of the first article of the Constitution? Take it with what goes before and what comes after, consider the subject-matter of the several powers enumerated, and the language with which Article I is introduced, namely, "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested," &c.—language not used in introducing the delegation of powers to either of the other two branches of the Government—and we get at the outset the impression of a carefully limited and restricted investiture of legislative powers in this body called Congress. There are enumerated in this eighth section sixteen distinct subjects of common and public interest and concern, with regard to which Congress is invested with legislative power, not including the taxing power of the first clause or the supplementary and qualifying power in the eighteenth clause. What are they? Let me very briefly, without reading at large, show what are the subjects of public concern mentioned in the eighth section of the first article:

1. To borrow money on the credit of the United States.
2. To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.
3. To establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.
4. To coin money and regulate the value thereof.
5. To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States.
6. To establish post-offices and post-roads.
7. To promote the progress of science and useful arts by copyrights and patents.
8. To constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court.
9. To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations.
10. To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water.
11. To raise and support armies.
12. To provide and maintain a navy.
13. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.
14. To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union.
15. To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States.
16. To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over the District of Columbia and ceded places.

An examination of these sixteen subjects thus committed to the control and charge of Congress shows them to be each and all of the utmost and highest importance to the well-being and general welfare of the people of the United States.

It is also apparent that in regard to these sixteen subject-matters of legislative control it is for the best interests and happiness of the people that the legislative power granted should be exercised, except in the case of the second item in regard to borrowing money.

Now, it is plain that the grant of power to lay and collect taxes is very different in its essential character from the other grants to which I have alluded. That power does not of itself and by itself relate to a subject-matter which it is one of the interests of civilized society to promote and conserve. No one is made happier or better or safer or more comfortable by the mere fact of having money taken from him in the shape of taxes. The character of the power to lay and collect taxes differs essentially from that of all the other powers enumerated in this section. It is an ancillary power, not one to be exercised for its own sake. It is necessarily attendant on the direct and substantive powers and jurisdictions conferred on government.

In a government of limited and enumerated powers it clearly can not be invoked for objects not within that government's jurisdiction or control. It can not transcend the limitations upon those powers to which it is auxiliary and attendant. I admit that this power to lay and collect taxes for the purposes that are within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government is unlimited as to amounts and as to methods, except in the respect expressed in the section; but I deny that it is unlimited as to the purposes or occasions for which and on which it may be invoked. If the power to lay and collect taxes had been given without more, it must be conceded that it would have been subordinate to and attendant upon the other powers and jurisdictions conferred by the Constitution.

How, then, can the scope of the power be enlarged by the words "in order to provide for the general welfare of the United States," which are admitted on all hands to be words of qualification; that is to say, you may lay the tax, you may take money from the pockets of the people to promote any object within the jurisdiction and control of the Federal Government provided it is for the general welfare of the United States. A moral restriction, it is true, but one to be enjoined on the conscience of Senators and Representatives.

And here it is well to call attention again to the fact that this qualifying purpose, for which taxes may be levied and collected, is the general welfare of the people not of the United States nor of the States but of the political organism called the "United States."

The second clause of this section granting power to borrow money expresses it "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." That shows that the words "United States" without adding "of America" were meant to indicate the political organism known by that phrase.

Surely here in the phraseology itself of the qualification, apart from the restrictions that come from the general scope and limitations of the Constitution taken as a whole, is a very large and important restriction of the universality of the phrase "to provide for the general welfare."

But what are we to say when we find that this qualification of the ancillary power of taxation is interpreted to be itself a specific grant of an independent power, to wit, a power of appropriation without limitation, a new power invented, while the other question which I alluded to at the outset of my remarks had been disposed of by saying that this can not be interpreted to be a general grant of power to legislate for the general welfare, but must be taken in connection with the taxing power. Now we have an interpretation which admits that these words are words of qualification, but yet contends that they do create and do grant a specific power of a certain kind, to wit, a power of appropriation.

This so-called indefinite and unlimited power of appropriation, if it exists, would break down every barrier that has been erected by the Constitution and the scheme of dual government which it creates against invasion of the reserved powers and autonomy of the States. If those subjects and those provinces of governmental power and jurisdiction which have been committed to the Federal Government, wide and great and important as they are, do not also prescribe the limitations of the taxing power, which, in the language of Judge Cooley, is merely "an incident" of them, then it was in vain that our fathers endeavored to form a government of limited powers.

It was not necessary to confer a special power of appropriating the funds which were to be raised under the power to tax. The power to appropriate went with the power to levy and collect the tax, so that we are driven, it seems to me, to the common-sense interpretation, that the words "to provide for the general welfare of the United States" are a qualification merely of this incidental and subordinate power of taxation and not a specific grant of an independent power. But it is said that to provide for the general welfare is the declaration of a purpose as wide as the interests of humanity; so it would be in a government of unlimited powers. But in our scheme of a partition of powers between the general and State governments the "general welfare" that is to be provided for must necessarily be that portion of the "general welfare" which has been committed to the care of the General Government.

You can not read this or any other clause of the Constitution except in the light of and in connection with all the conditions and qualifying restrictions that are made by its other provisions and the scheme of government it established. What, sir, was the great achievement of our fathers who framed this Government of ours if it was not that they, for the first time in the history of governments, laid down in advance by means of a written constitution the boundaries and limitations of the power they conferred. They knew that the heart of man was "deceitful above all things and desperately wicked," and could not be trusted when assailed by lust of power, avarice, or ambition. Nay, they knew that the very virtues which find their home in the human breast, benevolence, patriotism, and white-robed charity, might tempt men to step beyond the just limits of governmental activity, unless they were restrained by written organic law, ordained and established in advance of the occasions or the exigencies that required such restraint.

They knew full well that all the governments of the civilized world, whether absolute monarchies or limited monarchies or those despotisms which were only tempered by assassination, professed that the ends of their existence were domestic tranquillity, the general welfare, and the maintenance of justice. And they also knew full well how often these high ends had failed of fruition and what crimes had been committed in their name. They therefore proclaimed in the preamble of the Constitution that "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, they did ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." In other words, this was their plan for securing those great ends of all civilized governments, and which had failed of realization in the other governments of the world.

No words more significant or of graver import were ever penned than those contained in this preamble of the Constitution. They in effect said, all these great ends of government which all human societies seek to achieve but measurably fail to realize we propose to accomplish and make realities by creating a government of delegated and enumerated and strictly limited powers. We propose to make the experiment by the means and the methods and in the manner hereinafter set forth. We will promote and provide for "the general welfare" by leaving nothing to chance or the caprice of the moment, by declaring in writing and by explicit language in what respect and how that general welfare is to be provided for and promoted. How, then, without a violation of this manifest spirit of our Constitution, can we assert that this clause of the Constitution so introduced can create a power to appropriate the money of the people not only to an object not within the jurisdiction of the Government, but clearly and exclusively within the jurisdiction of the States.

This Government, within the legitimate sphere of its action, stands erect, efficient, and omnipotent; its powers are plenary and complete. It has none that are uncertain, or are dependent on permission of prince, potentate, or political organism outside of itself. Its just powers can be asserted everywhere and against all opposition. Why then seek to introduce confusion and disorder into this admirably arranged and wisely constructed system of State and National Governments. Consent can not confer jurisdiction, and the consent of the States can not enlarge the constitutional scope of Federal power. There is only one way in which the consent of the States can be efficient for that purpose, and that is the way pointed out in the Constitution for its amendment. If the field of jurisdiction is denied to the Federal Government and retained by the States, you can not enter it by force, you can not assert your authority in invitum; this will be at once conceded. Then is it not just as much ultra vires to enter it by stealth, or by reason of the negligence or the passiveness of those to whom it rightfully belongs?

What difference in principle is there between an assertion of a right of control to be exercised in invitum over one of the municipal institutions of the States and the exercise of the same power under a license purchased from the States? Whether you force your way in or buy your way into the prohibited domain can matter little, except that the latter is the more demoralizing method of the two.

Is it to be believed that powers can come to the General Government as the result of negotiation, persuasion, or bargain with the States; that the general-welfare clause gives a power of appropriation to Congress which is dormant until it is awakened and energized by negotiation and bargain between the States and Federal Government?

The argument in its favor can be and has been reduced to an absurdity by pointing out the cases that must logically follow such a precedent. If in the opinion of good men here in Congress the judicial system of a State or States seems bad or to need improvement, all Congress would have to do would be to pass a law making an appropriation under the general-welfare clause offering to defray all the expenses of the judicial establishment of the States, provided the States conformed the appointment of their judges, the constitution of their courts, and the general administration of justice to the provisions prescribed by the law. The States are struggling with the problem of city government. Could not Congress be persuaded at some time that it was for the "general welfare" that they should take this problem into their own hands by passing a law appropriating money to pay the expense of municipal government in whole or in part, provided the States should make their city charters after this fashion or that, by enlarging or diminishing the powers of local self-government?

Or could it not be argued that it was for the general welfare that governors be elected for a longer period or that Legislatures should have less frequent sessions or that women should vote at all elections; if so, there is the power to appropriate the money on any conditions you choose to prescribe, and it only remains for the State to accept the offer and abdicate its functions. Can it be that our great principle of local self-government, through the autonomies of the States, is exposed to dangers like these; that our Constitution, that we thought so strong in its limitations as well as in its power, is so weak on a single side? Did our fathers build less wisely than they thought, and after laying down the lines of demarkation between State and federal power so broad and clear and erecting the walls of our constitutional citadel so high and strong and on foundations so deep and permanent, leave wide open this postern door through which the enemies of local self-government with the banners of centralization and absolutism flaunting in the breeze can enter and possess themselves of our heritage? I do not believe it. No door was thus left open or unguarded; and I for one shall not assist in taking down the bars or drawing the bolts that keep it closed.

I said, Mr. President, at the outset that there was no precedent, properly so called, for the legislation proposed by this bill, and I am aware of none. This bill proposes to appropriate money to defray in part the expenses of the educational system—a municipal institution in the States, an institution not only clearly outside of the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, but exclusively within that of the States, and now conducted and actively managed and controlled by the States. Now, I have shown, if I have shown anything, and the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Alabama have shown better than I, that the power to appropriate money raised by taxation (and which is an incident of the power to levy and collect the tax) can only be exercised for purposes within the scope of Federal jurisdiction and control, and then only to provide for the general welfare of the United States, and that there is no possible right to control or attempt to control the subjects over which the States have retained their complete authority. If any of the cases of appropriation by Congress under the power alleged to be conferred by this general-welfare clause have touched or affected the municipal institutions and concerns of the States then actively managed and conducted by them, I have failed to observe it.

I do not, in distinguishing from the present case the cases cited as precedents in the past history of the country, impose on myself the task of finding for them constitutional warrant. I merely call attention to what I believe to be the fact, that they none of them involved the appropriation of money for matters, institutions, or concerns that were exclusively and actively controlled and managed by the States.

Now, I admit that the opinions of those entitled to speak with authority are conflicting. Mr. Jefferson can be cited on both sides of this question, and so can Mr. Monroe, who acknowledges in his message of May 4, 1822, that his mind had undergone a change respecting the power of appropriation. And it is worthy of remark that in that message respecting the bill for the repair of the Cumberland road the burden of his argument was to show that the words "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" did not import a separate and independent grant of power, which, as he remarked, "would in effect break down all barriers between the States and the General Government and consolidate the whole under the latter," but indicated the purpose for which taxes were authorized to be laid and collected. I am content to rest the decision of the question on the argument made by Mr. Madison and quoted by the Senator from Alabama—the citations from Judge Cooley's work on taxation made by the Senator from Texas in his speech of Thursday last. To these I add the crown of Chief-Justice Marshall's opinion in Gibbons vs. Ogden, which, though obiter, is nevertheless weighty and authoritative:

> This does not interfere with the power of the States to tax for the support of their own governments—

Speaking of this very clause that Congress is authorized to levy and collect taxes, &c., to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States—

> nor is the exercise of that power by the States an exercise of any portion of the power that is granted to the United States. In imposing taxes for State purposes they are not doing what Congress is empowered to do. Congress is not empowered to tax for those purposes which are within the exclusive province of the States. (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, page 199.)

Mr. President, I trust that it may not be thought presumption in me if I beg Senators older in experience and wiser than I to hesitate long before taking the first step in this new and unexplored pathway of Federal encroachment. Down its dark vistas I see shapes of direful portent and I shrink from the encounter. Over the leveled bulwarks of the Constitution will come thronging thick and fast the armies of centralization and the enemies of local self-government. We may still find life worth living under the new dispensation, but we will never cease to mourn the Constitution of our fathers wounded to death in the house of its friends.

Mr. President, I have no desire to see the map of the United States painted over with one color, whether that color be a royal purple or socialistic red. I at least shall not assist in thus obliterating the lines of the States, and with them the ancient landmarks of the Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Delaware a question. I desire to know if the Senator has expressed any opinion, or if he has not is he willing to express it now, as to the power of Congress to donate the public lands to the States in aid of education?

Mr. GRAY. I did not think it worth while within the line I had laid down for myself to address myself to the question which has just been put by the Senator from Mississippi. I did not undertake to discuss, nor do I undertake now to discuss, what particular power or legislative authority there was in Congress in the past history of our country to donate the proceeds of the public lands or the lands themselves—I do not know whether there are such grants—for the purposes of education.

I was content to leave that argument and that distinction where it was left by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. He very fully, very ably, and very clearly, as I thought, did distinguish between the power of Congress to deal with the public lands or their proceeds, which had been given to the United States as a political organism or corporation by the States upon a specified and stated trust, and its power over money raised by taxation. I do not think I could add anything to the force of the argument with which he sustained the difference between that specific trust in regard to that part of the lands ceded to the General Government by the States and the trust that, as was argued by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], attaches to and is impressed upon all grants of power. I can only say that the argument made by the Senator from Alabama impressed me as one that was sound and one which did draw a distinction that was not without importance in its application to this matter.

Mr. President, not in the line of an answer to the question put by the Senator from Mississippi, but because I omitted in the remarks which I made to allude to it as I intended to do, I will present now, if I may be permitted, certain language which is used in a very able article on the constitutionality of this bill which I find in a New Orleans paper, the Daily Picayune, because the language of that writer does suggest an interpretation of these words which has been anxiously sought for by so many Senators, and in regard to the interpretation of which I confess there are difficulties. I say that this writer has suggested a reading, a gloss of that section, which is worthy of attentive consideration. He says:

> The action of the convention that planned the instrument—
> The Constitution—
> teaches the same lesson.
> August 5, 1787, the clause in question appeared as follows: "The Legislature of the United States shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." (5 Elliott's Debates, 376.)
> August 23, 1787, Mr. Sherman moved to add to the clause: "For the payment of said debts and for defraying the expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense and general welfare." (Ibid., 476.)
> This addition was then deemed unnecessary; but on September 4 "Mr. Brearly from the committee of eleven"—
> Which I believe was the committee of style—
> modified and added to it; and the subsequent "committee on revision" approved the amendment, so that the clause now reads: "To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises [to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States].

I read that because, apart from the interest in it as part of the history of the formation of the Constitution, it lets us see something of the formative process by which this result was reached in our present Constitution. It also suggests, most happily I submit, to my mind at least, that these words should now be so interpreted and that interpretation contained in Mr. Sherman's amendment or suggestion is today the true interpretation and the only one that is consistent with all the other limitations of the Constitution, its letter and its spirit. So then this power to lay and collect taxes means that they can be raised in order to defray the expenses incurred in providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. That seems to be the right, logical, and sensible construction, one that reconciles all parts of the Constitution to it, harmonizes the supposed conflict that has been alluded to in this debate, and leaves it still with the ramparts and the bulwarks of the Constitution unimpaired in all its pristine strength and vigor.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator to yield that I may make an announcement. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] gave notice that at 2 o'clock to-day he desired to discuss the Chinese question. He is sick and confined to his room, and desires me to say that he will ask permission to address the Senate on Thursday at 2 o'clock.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, it is so thoroughly understood that speeches made here do not convince those to whom they are nominally addressed, that I take it it is universally understood equally that they are made for the outside public. I do not think there is any other single thing which so thoroughly illustrates the popular character of this body, and of the House of Representatives, as this fact, equally applicable to both bodies. This is a public assize, and the legislation which we adopt is perhaps as nearly related to an honest, conservative, and permanent public opinion as though it were adopted by a mass convention of all the people of the United States assembled for that purpose and having time enough and opportunity to fairly discuss the propositions that might be submitted.

In addressing the Senate, therefore, upon this question I do not do so with the expectation of changing any votes here or of influencing in any way the decision of this body upon this great and very important question; but I do it as my justification to the people who sent me here for the vote I give, and who have a right to, as they will carefully, consider what I do and the reasons which I may give for my action, and also for the benefit of that greater public which has a claim upon each member of this body, no matter from what State he comes.

In the first place this legislation is anomalous. There is no one who can point out a law on the statute-book which not only appropriates money for present expenses or for present operations or purposes and at the same time projects a similar expenditure into the future. When I speak of the future I do not speak alone of the future which is mentioned in this bill, the eight years of time which, according to its terms, it is to cover, but I speak of the indefinite future reaching far beyond that, because, as has well been said here, these appropriations will not stop at eight years. The appetite which they will have created—an abnormal distension of what may be called the school systems of the several States, and especially of the Southern States—will not be satisfied with a peremptory cutting off of the pabulum upon which they have been fed at the expiration of eight years; but unless the absolute unwisdom of the appropriation shall finally have been established, and unless the appetites which have been fed thereby have been gorged to repletion, there will be an assemblage of influence and interest represented by caucuses, by political movements in the several States, by conventions, and by elections, that will have pledged members and Senators to come here and vote to continue that which we are about, I fear unwisely, to begin.

So, Mr. President, we are committing now the National Government to a policy which is to call upon us for expenditures for perhaps generations to come, and expenditures which will finally be the means of embracing within their scope either the entire educational system of the States, or at least such a supervision of them as will constantly call for these additional appropriations.

Who knows where this money is to come from? The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, recently submitted to Congress, estimates that the requirements of the National Government, including the sinking fund, will this year exhaust the entire revenue of the Government. Will any one vote for this bill if by so doing he is required at the next moment of time to impose taxes whereby the money to be appropriated shall be levied from the people of the United States? Who so wise as to know or even be able to give any reasonable assurance that within twelve months he may not be required to impose taxes in order that the requirements of this bill may be met?

We have a constantly increasing pension-roll based upon a legal obligation assumed by the United States Government when it called into its service two millions of men for the national defense. Each year the amount of money required to satisfy it increases. There has already been proposed by the other branch of Congress an increase of annual levy for that purpose of some six or seven million dollars, and measures are pending in both bodies based upon justice, demanded I might say by a fair consideration of that which is legally due to the men whom the Government invited to enlist and who on that invitation did enlist for the national defense, which, if carried out even partially will not only exhaust all existing sources of revenue, but will deprive the sinking fund out of which the national debt is to be discharged of that which we have solemnly pledged by law it shall always contain.

I know that the very magnitude of this appropriation is a recommendation. I know that a proposition to appropriate $77,000,000 is seventy-seven times as strong as would be a proposition to appropriate a million dollars. We have become so accustomed to financial operations of great magnitude that there is something attractive in them. We are like the man who built the Union Pacific Railroad, traversing a great range of mountains and binding together the Atlantic and the Pacific by an iron rail. He never would consent to build a railroad 30 or 40 miles long or to engage in any of the smaller transactions of life. His abilities, his faculties, his ambitions were all attuned to greater things. And so when we come to consider money matters we spurn under our feet sums of money that thirty years ago would have been regarded as of the greatest possible consequence. So, as I said, the larger the sum the more attractive it is and the greater the freedom with which we vote. So this bill appropriating $77,000,000 is attractive by reason of its magnitude. I only wonder that the wise prevision of its framer—not the Republican caucus but the Senator from New Hampshire—did not make it ten times $77,000,000, and so anticipate with confidence a unanimous vote in this and the other body.

But, Mr. President, the time is coming, soon to be here, liable to come at any moment, when the question of an abundant revenue or of a deficit is to be measured by hundreds of thousands of dollars, and he who would impose burdens upon the Treasury must by the same token impose burdens upon the tax-payers to meet them. This bill was the outgrowth of the demoralized condition of things which always precedes a Presidential campaign. If there is any time in which the Congress of the United States or the people who mold public opinion are less qualified than at any other time for the serious concerns of government, for that wise and careful prevision of financial affairs that ought always to be an accompaniment of legislation, it is that period which precedes a Presidential election, when issues are being made, when the interests of candidates are being forwarded, and when we are laying plans and traps whereby we may catch our unwary adversaries. At that time measures for the benefit of some individual person or some class of persons or some section of the country are always attractive, and then there is a rush pell-mell, every party seeking to outrun every other party in devotion to that particular interest in order to get votes. This measure was the outgrowth of that demoralized and that demoralizing epoch immediately preceding the last Presidential election. But for that it never would have had a respectable vote in this body, and but for that its chances of passage would be at the minimum.

Mr. President, I have here a statement of the taxable valuation of some of the Southern States for 1860 and since, which I use as an example.

Assessed valuation.

States.	Year.	Population.	Assessed valuation.
South Carolina	1860	703,708	$489,319,128
	1870	705,606	183,913,337
	1880	995,577	133,560,135
Florida	1860	140,424	68,929,685
	1870	187,748	32,480,843
	1880	269,493	30,938,308
Alabama	1860	964,201	432,198,762
	1870	996,922	155,582,595
	1880	1,262,505	122,867,228
Louisiana	1860	708,002	435,787,265
	1870	726,915	253,371,890
	1880	939,946	160,162,439
Georgia	1860	1,057,286	618,232,387
	1870	1,184,109	227,219,519
	1880	1,542,180	239,472,599
North Carolina	1860	992,602	292,297,602
	1870	1,071,361	130,378,622
	1880	1,399,750	156,100,202
Virginia	1860	1,596,318	657,021,336
	1870	1,225,163	365,439,917

Now I say, what every man knows, that I can count on the fingers of my two hands the members on this floor who are actually in favor of this measure, who will dare avow that they are for it as an original proposition or as one that commends itself to their judgment. But one man says, "I made incautiously somewhere a speech in favor of it, and at a time when I did not consider the surroundings;" and another man says, "My Legislature say they want me to vote for it;" and so on all the way around. If there could be some way of voting upon this measure without meeting these conditions it would have practically no support. I do not believe legislation thus enacted is likely to be wise.

What is the justification for it? The Senator from New Hampshire said what I think no Southern Senator has yet said, that it was because the Southern States were unable themselves to meet the requirements of popular education within their limits. In speaking of the devastation of the war and its result he says:

> We helped to create that devastation. We destroyed slavery in the joint effort wherein the resistance of the Southerner was just as necessary as the aggression of the Northerner. In no other way could that institution have been destroyed at all; and it was destroyed for the general good, for the national good; as we all know, it was an institution for which the nation as a nation, the whole people, North as well as South, were responsible. Having accomplished a common good, and the people in that portion of the country which was the particular scene of its devastations being left without property, having to reconstruct society, to reconstruct their institutions and establish a new system of labor among them and make the masses of laborers intelligent, white as well as black—under these circumstances, it being the demonstration of the census and in fact commonly known to all men that they have gone to the very extent of their capacity to bear the burdens of taxation, and yet have not reached the point of the education of their children as a whole, I think there is a moral obligation, I think there is a legal and a constitutional obligation, a national obligation on the part of the whole people to assist our friends at the South temporarily until they are fairly on their feet and can enter on the great race of life with a fair opportunity and a fair chance with their brothers in other and more highly favored portions of the country.

I take issue with that as a statement of a fact. I say that it is not a fact; and no Senator has arisen as I think on the Democratic side of the Chamber to say that such is the fact. Here before me sits one of the most enterprising and active of the business men of what is known as the Empire State of the South, Georgia. He has had occasion in the exercise of his business of managing railroads and of manufacturing iron and so on to put forth advertisements, prospectuses, representations in regard to the resources of that great State, showing how inviting it was for immigration, how the laboring man was wanted there and how the capitalist was wanted there and everybody else was wanted there in order that he might make money and get great returns from having gone there. I think he would not have added to one of his advertisements to the people of the North or to the people of the Old Country "we are all right here, except that if you come you must understand we have not money enough to educate your children." Will any immigration bureau under the auspices of any State put forth a statement of that kind?

On the contrary, are not the newspapers and all the public prints filled with statements exactly the opposite? The South is not representing to-day its inability to carry on a system of education which will be broad enough and extensive enough and useful enough to embrace every single child of school age within its limits. Quite the contrary.

A great deal has been said about the loss of slaves. As was well said by my colleague, the destruction of slavery was no pecuniary loss to the South. The property was all there; it was simply the ownership that was changed. The decline in taxable valuation from 1860 to 1870 represented everything that could possibly be said as the result of the devastation of war, including the removal from the tax-roll of the slaves, who before that time had been taxed as other property.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. PLUMB. I will.

Mr. GEORGE. I presume that in the other Southern States, like it was in Mississippi before the war, slave property was not taxed by valuation, but taxed per capita. So the value of the slaves never went into the aggregate value of the taxable property of the State.

Mr. PLUMB. Then the Senator from Mississippi would be saying in effect that South Carolina lost by reason of the destruction of property during the war $300,000,000.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know that that is true in reference to South Carolina. I only speak in reference to Mississippi, and I suppose it applies to the other States. Other Senators can speak for those States.

Mr. PLUMB. At all events, the taxable valuation as shown now represents land, houses, cattle, horses, hogs—everything of that kind that is property elsewhere.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will allow me, I will make another statement on that subject. Since the war taxation in the South has been tending to include all classes of property. Before the war a great deal of property was never taxed at all. For instance, I can speak in reference to my own State. No money securities of any sort were ever taxed before the war in Mississippi, except securities given for money loaned.

Mr. PLUMB. Remembering, as I do, the extent to which the South was indebted to the North about the time of the war, and what became of that indebtedness, I presume there was no property of that kind to be taxed. There had been taken out of the taxable property of the Southern States, and had been prior to the year 1870, all the destruction of property accruing because of the war, including the destruction of slave property and every other thing that had tended to depreciate that property. I do not care to comment to any considerable extent on the fact that some of the States have shown a diminution of taxable valuation according to the returns between 1870 and 1880, that while they increase in population they decrease in taxable valuation; but I desire to call attention to the fact that every Southern State had more miles of railroad in 1880 than it had in 1870, more iron furnaces, and more of all the things that go to make up wealth than they ever had before.

But take it as it is now, with every single thing charged off that could possibly be charged to the war, the Southern States which I have named have a taxable valuation shown by the figures of 1880, and on the basis of that I say that every single one of them is able, financially able, to take care of and give a good, fair common-school education to every child of school age within its limits.

Who is to pay this money and who is to get it? I have a table here which exhibits what certain States get and what they pay under this bill:

Alabama—		Delaware—
Gets	$5,370,848	Pays	$205,251
Pays	1,767,507	Florida—
Arkansas—		Gets	993,548
Gets	2,503,170	Pays	377,290
Pays	1,123,535	Georgia—

Pays	871,780	Iowa—
Delaware—		Gets	577,532
Gets	240,559	Pays	2,274,461

Mr. GEORGE. What does the Senator mean by a State paying so much?

Mr. PLUMB. I mean that is the proportion of this $77,000,000 which is levied upon and paid by the people of the respective States.

Mr. GEORGE. If levied according to direct taxation by the Federal ratio?

Mr. PLUMB. Collected by the Government of the United States on the clothing we wear, the sugar, the salt, and so on, that we eat, just as we pay all the national taxes that are levied.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it a calculation on the basis of population?

Mr. PLUMB. On the basis of population by the census of 1880, in which I beg the Senate to bear in mind that no account is taken of the increase in the population since that date of the Western States, nor the increase yet to come; their constant increase will make them bear a much larger burden than is here shown. I will carry the statement through all the States and Territories.

Mr. President, when we come to levy a tax for the payment of money which is not to be equally expended, there ought to be ample justification for such levy. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he is willing to levy upon the lumbermen of Wisconsin, to levy upon the wage-workers of that great State, the amount of money necessary to meet the amount they will have to pay over and above what they will get in order that it may be given to the Southern States?

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. Would there be any difference between expending $7,000,000 (which is the amount this bill asks for the first year and none is appropriated) for the common schools of the country and expending the same amount of money for the improvement of rivers and harbors? Might there not be some sort of discrimination shown as between States in that regard, where some States do not fare quite as well as others?

Mr. PLUMB. That money is levied on the theory that the expenditure of it is for the benefit of the whole people, and I am showing that this expenditure is not for the benefit of the whole people. If that is the theory, then I want the Senator from New Hampshire to be willing to have the bill amended in such a way that the money shall be paid to the different States according to their population, and not distributed according to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Would the Senator like to be answered now, treating that as a question?

Mr. PLUMB. I have no control over the Senator from New Hampshire. He can answer it now or later, just as he pleases.

Mr. BLAIR. I will, without trespassing much on the Senator's time, just say that the theory of the bill is that illiteracy is considered as dangerous to the public good or general welfare as any imperfection in our rivers and harbors, and it is expressly upon the ground that it is a national and general evil that calls for a remedy by contributions from the national finances that the bill is pressed upon the Senate. The contribution of the country for the improvement of our rivers and harbors is for the general good. There are many States which will not draw a single dollar of that expenditure probably or but a very small amount; and that tax is paid cheerfully by all. It is the opinion of those who favor this measure that general ignorance is as dangerous to one portion of the country as another, and that it equally calls for a national contribution for a remedy.

Mr. PLUMB. I think I shall show—at least I have already demonstrated to my own satisfaction by the investigation which I have given to this subject—that the theory on which this bill proceeds, as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, is absolutely untrue; that there is not a single Southern State but that is just as able to educate to the extent of giving a reasonable common-school education to its school children as any Northern State is.

The State of New Hampshire pays $485,787 of this expenditure and gets $177,216. I imagine that even the astute and eloquent Senator from New Hampshire will have some little trouble in justifying his advocacy of this bill, which levies $300,000 net off the wage-workers of that State to give to people who do not need it. I will take one or two further samples.

New York gets $2,721,066, and pays $7,116,019; North Carolina gets the smg sum of $5,749,121, and pays $1,959,650; South Carolina gets $4,582,792, and pays $1,393,807; Tennessee gets $5,089,262, and pays $2,159,302; Virginia gets $5,332,498, and pays $2,117,591; Wisconsin gets $688,420, and pays $1,841,695.

There should be justification for this inequality. It is not to be done by argument. It must be demonstrated. I do not care whether the measure is constitutional or not; it is enough to say that it is not a wise expenditure of public money. I can say on the construction of the Constitution, however, that if this be constitutional, then hereafter there are no States except as they exist in the imagination, because they have no function which can not be absorbed at the will of the National Government. If this is constitutional, then it is constitutional to abrogate the States, because if we can devote money to the public schools of the different States, and follow it too, as the Senator from Maryland well said on Friday, for the purpose of seeing that it is properly expended, nominate to them the system of schools which they shall carry on, provide that they shall not build school-houses with it—if we can limit the expenditure, then we may go further and seize the entire system and put it into bonds under control here at Washington. It may be constitutional, but I do not think that is wise. But it is enough for me to know, for the purpose of the vote I shall give, that it is an unwise and unwarranted expenditure of the public money.

But, Mr. President, the theory upon which this bill is founded fails on the Senator's own statement of its purpose. I read again from his speech. I take it no one will question his authority to speak for the bill. His theory is that as we freed the slave, as we thereby launched upon the Southern States a great mass of ignorant people, we are under obligation to remove that ignorance by appropriations from the National Treasury. In his speech made on the 16th of February the Senator from New Hampshire said:

> It has been stated in the speech of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] this afternoon that there are about four million children in the Southern States who are not enrolled at all, who are not attending school at all, and we by this bill make no provision for this vast uncultivated class who are outside the present operations of the common-school system.

Is that lifting the burdens of the war from these people when we leave outside the four million children who are not now enrolled? The very class that he uses for the purpose of getting us to make this appropriation are not to benefit a dollar by it. No, sir; the blacks whom we freed, the ignorant people whom we left on the hands of the Southern States as freedmen, are not to have it. They are not embraced within the terms of this bill; it is for somebody else, and thus, if the Senator from New Hampshire is authorized to speak for this bill, the very foundation disappears from under it.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I do not think he understands me in what I have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. PLUMB. I yield.

Mr. BLAIR. The general fact was stated by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] that only about one-third the children of the South are enrolled. There are, speaking in round numbers, about six million children there within the school ages who should be educated; only about one-third of them are enrolled. Those who are enrolled are the ones that are presumed to attend school. Those who are not enrolled are not for the time being attending school. I stated that the amount of money proposed by this bill to be distributed throughout the country would give to the South only the means of extending the length of the schools which now exist——

Mr. PLUMB. I can not yield to the Senator to make another speech in my time.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will allow me to make my point, as I was making it briefly. The money thus paid out would simply be sufficient to extend existing schools to what would seem to be only a reasonable period—that is, six months. Of course, when it comes to be applied it will be used with the other public funds of the State in establishing schools where they do not exist, but in so far as other schools are established the length of the whole school period must be shortened. The point I was making was that this appropriation, which is being talked about as so enormous, is very far short of the amount that is really necessary in proportion to the evil that exists.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, the people of the Southern States, like the people of the Northern States, not only assess their own property but impose their own taxes. The Senator, for the purpose of showing the necessity of this appropriation, published certain tables in that number of the RECORD which he had all to himself. I quoted the taxable property of some of the Southern States. The States which I quoted from I only used as samples. I did not select them. They fairly represent the whole. South Carolina, with a taxable valuation in 1880 of $133,000,000, paid $440,000 for school purposes. The Southern States, too, have cheaper State and local government than the Northern States. In the South the county is the unit of local government. There are no such subdivisions as are known in the North. In the State of Kansas, which is a fair sample of the Northern States, there are subdivisions within the counties having taxable power, the road district, the school district, the township, the town, and the city, every one of them having independent taxing power and every one of them supreme within a limit fixed by the Legislature, and not a narrow limit neither in regard to levying taxes for the purposes for which these different subdivisions of the municipality are created.

I asked the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] what per cent. was paid in the State of Arkansas. He said that they pay for all purposes, State, county, and school purposes, outside of the great cities, 12 mills on the dollar.

Mr. BLAIR. What State is that?

Mr. PLUMB. Arkansas. Is it true then that the Southern States require the levying of taxes on the North to help them?

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to correct him?

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all; I am speaking of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Arkansas would do well to study the teachings of the census on that same point. I will, however, take occasion to reply later.

Mr. PLUMB. I am quoting the Senator from Arkansas who sits in front of me. He said to me yesterday, and I made a memorandum of it, that the entire levy of taxes in that State, except in the cities, did not exceed 12 mills.

Mr. BLAIR. It is $2.12 on the hundred dollars.

Mr. BERRY. In speaking to the Senator from Kansas yesterday I had reference to the counties particularly in my locality, in the northern part of the State. I stated to him that in other sections of the State, especially in the cities, the taxes were higher on account of the county debts that had been entailed upon them and that they were still owing.

Mr. PLUMB. That does not differ from my statement at all. I stated that outside of the cities the gross levy for all purposes in the State of Arkansas is 12 mills.

Mr. BLAIR. It is $2.12.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask any Senator on this floor whether that is the full tax-paying capacity of the State of Arkansas? Of that only five mills are levied for school purposes, and the balance for other county and State purposes. The State of Kansas in 1870, with a taxable valuation of $92,000,000, levied $672,000 for schools, while the State of South Carolina with $133,000,000 of taxable valuation, more than 50 per cent. greater, the same year levied 50 per cent. less for school purposes.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand the Senator from Kansas does not wish to be interrupted by me, but I should like to correct him in regard to his own State.

Mr. PLUMB. I decline to yield to the Senator from New Hampshire. He not only had two days of time but one entire number of the RECORD to make his speech in. When I have gone as far as he has then I shall yield to him.

Mr. BLAIR. I thought the Senator might like to be accurate about his own State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas declines to be interrupted.

Mr. PLUMB. South Carolina in 1877 levied only $282,451 for school purposes. The State of Louisiana, with a population in 1860 of 708,000, with an assessed valuation of $435,000,000, levied $726,000. In 1870, with an assessed valuation of $253,000,000, it levied $456,000. All the States of the South without exception levy from one-quarter to one-half what is levied for similar purposes according to the taxable valuation by the Northern States. When the war was over, and five years after the war closed, there was not one of all the States which I have named that had not a taxable valuation largely in excess of the State of Kansas. What was the difference against them in that year compared with that State? They had been through the war for four years, they had the same rich soil they had had before, the same climate, the same great forests of timber, the same mines of coal and iron, the same navigable water open all the year round, and they were naturally favored above all other sections of the United States. Was that worse to start with than comparatively nothing?

Yet the State of Kansas since that time has appropriated more than four times more in proportion to its population, and having regard also to its wealth, than any Southern State has appropriated, and it has done it not upon the basis of inherited wealth; it has done it upon wealth which it has created meanwhile. In 1861, at the close of the Territorial period, the State of Kansas, emerging from its own war only to enter into another one, expended $1,700 for school purposes. In 1862, in the midst of that great struggle, it increased the appropriation to $11,000, in 1863 to $26,000, in 1864 to $84,000, and in 1865 to $137,000.

Now, suppose that the State of Kansas and those Southern States commenced without property at the close of the war, with nothing but population, and let us see what the difference is. Since 1865 the State of Kansas has appropriated for common schools more than $29,000,000, and every dollar that it has appropriated has proved an attraction for the State to all the people of the United States seeking homes, and it has thereby added year by year to its population and wealth according to its expenditure for this great and noble purpose. Thirty million dollars in thirty years, and an expenditure for the last year of nearly $3,000,000! Talk about a levy of 12 mills! What the people of Kansas have asked is not what they would like to pay, not alone either what they were able to pay, but what the situation demanded of them. A little hamlet to-day rises on what was yesterday a naked and unoccupied plain, and under the law of that State where there is a school district containing twelve children the electors (and that embraces in that State for all school purposes women as well as men) get together in school meeting, patterned after the town meeting of New England, where every man and every woman votes, and levy a tax for the purpose of building a school-house, and if the taxable valuation is not sufficient for that purpose they pledge the future by the issue of bonds in order that there may be no delay in beginning the education of their children. And then follow adequate levies for the payment of teachers and other expenses.

The school-house is the principal object around which the settlement centers. The one thing which the man who settles on the Kansas soil will not be without is the facility for schooling his children, and where the school-house is planted, where the spirit exists to erect and maintain it, other spirits of the same kind, other ambitious, energetic, forceful, intelligent people come, and the hamlet of to-day is the organized county of to-morrow; and swift after this population come railroads. It is the sign by which the people of Kansas have conquered; and what they have done is not single and alone to them. While they have been doing this Nebraska has been doing the same thing. Dakota, Colorado, all the Western States and Territories are engaged in the same work in the same way by means of the same self-sacrifice.

A levy of 12 mills is more than the average in the country districts of the South for all purposes. While in Alabama a few years ago, talking with one of the keenest, wisest men of business of that State, he said to me that the only drawback was the rate of taxation. When I asked him what it was, he said, "Well, it is 1 per cent., but I think we can get it down to about 8 mills." He had spoken kindly of Kansas, about its growth, its enterprise, and so on. When I told him that our people levied sometimes 2½ and sometimes even as much as 5 per cent. in a single year for school purposes alone, such was their determination to have educational facilities, to have all the appliances of a highly ordered government, he was amazed.

The spirit which shirks the payment of taxes, of the imposition of necessary burdens, never builds school-houses or railroads. I know there may be, as there often is, such a thing as overtaxation, but there is also that which "withholdeth more than is meet and it tendeth to poverty." One of the results of low taxes in the South is lack of interest in public affairs. Why is it that our census tables and election returns show that less votes are cast in proportion in most of the election districts of the South than in those of the North? Why is it that there is lack of interest in county affairs, including schools? It is because the one aspiration, the one determination, is that the government shall be cheap, and so long as it is cheap the electors and property-owners are satisfied and take no further interest. The interest is proportioned to the stake. Levy taxes upon men, and they will promptly go to the polls and vote for the men who are to expend them. Levy taxes for the maintenance of schools, the building of bridges, court-houses, and all the appliances and protection of a well-ordered government, and the people will take good care that their judgment goes along with their money.

It is a grace of this kind that the South needs. If it should be seized with the enterprise to create schools, build good roads, and generally to bring together what the Northern people are accustomed to and which they will not be without, it would divert largely the stream of emigration which flows so full to the West and which shuns the South like a plague-spot.

The taxes in no Southern State, as I said, average half what they do in the Northern States. I leave out the cities, I take the country districts. If the State of Louisiana, or the State of South Carolina, or Alabama, or any other State levied taxes as they are levied in the Northern States, there would be a school fund ample for all the purposes of the education of every single person of school age within the limits of those States.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator stated a little while ago that the State of Kansas paid a school tax of 5 per cent. upon its property. I desire to know whether all the property in Kansas is taxed or whether only a portion of it is taxed for that purpose? Does the Senator mean to say that on all the wealth of Kansas 5 per cent. is levied?

Mr. PLUMB. I mean to say that it has been often levied, and that the only exception to the rule of constitutional taxation upon all property there is the exemption of $200 of personal property to the head of every family.

Mr. GEORGE. Everything else is taxed?

Mr. PLUMB. Everything else is taxed.

Mr. GEORGE. Is the taxation according to the actual value of the property?

Mr. PLUMB. It is a valuation which is required to be uniform. I do not think it extends in every case to the actual value of the property; that is, to its selling value, but I presume the same rule applies there as elsewhere; the people assess their own property, and the rule of law is that it shall be taxed at its actual value in cash.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator mean to say that the property of Kansas would sell for the amount at which it is assessed or for more?

Mr. PLUMB. It would probably sell for its assessed value—possibly for more. I do not mean to say that all property bears 5 per cent. tax every year; what I mean to say is that the amount is graded not according to what would ordinarily be called the ability to pay, but according to the necessity which exists of having schools, and that the question of rate is not allowed to stand between the settler there and the school facilities which he regards as material for his children. It may be 5 per cent., it may be 2 per cent., it may be 1 per cent. In the city in which I live the school-tax alone is 1 per cent. In some of the country districts it is a great deal more. Of course it varies, and as the population becomes more dense the tax becomes less; but I will venture to say that there is not a school district in that State in which it is as low as it is in the State of Arkansas to-day, according to the statement of the Senator from Arkansas—5 mills. It is oftener over 1 per cent. than under, and it is now lower in all the older settled portions of the State than it has been.

A false impression has been created as to the question of taxation for school purposes in Kansas and elsewhere. I see that the Commissioner of Education gives utterance to it in his report for 1883–'84. Speaking of the school system of Kansas he says:

> The public schools are supported from the proceeds of all lands granted by the United States, including 500,000 acres given to new States under act of September 4, 1841—

That is not very material, but I can state for his benefit that not one acre of that land goes into the school fund—> and also sections 16 and 36 in every township, granted by act of January 29, 1861; from estates of those dying without heir or will; from such per cent. as may be granted by Congress on the sale of lands in the State—> from a yearly tax of 1 mill on $1; and from an annual fee of $50 paid by every insurance company doing business in the State.

That is the 5 per cent.—

He states that as the sum of all the sums paid in Kansas for school purposes, when it was but a small fraction. As I said, the tax for school purposes in that State amounted last year to nearly $3,000,000, with a school population of about 460,000. The entire amount realized as income on the fund granted by the United States Government and including all the escheats and the fines and forfeitures in the State which go into the school fund only furnished 80 cents on the scholar. The balance was appropriated and paid by the people themselves by direct taxation levied upon their property.

I have here a table showing the amount that has been granted to every State in the Union for school purposes.

No grants to Indian and Alaska Territories.

Lands in sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in Territories not granted, but reserved.

Lands in place and indemnity for deficiencies in sections and townships, under acts of May 20, 1836, and February 26, 1859, included in above statement.

Something has been said about the question of the school fund arising out of the appropriation of sections 16 and 36. Every State admitted into the Union since 1846 has had sections 16 and 36. The States admitted prior to that time had one section to each township.

So the newer States, like Kansas and Nebraska, are not the only ones that have had lands for school purposes. Mississippi had 837,584 acres.

Mr. FRYE. For common schools?

Mr. PLUMB. For common schools.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to make an explanation there? I do not want to interrupt him unless it is agreeable to him.

Mr. PLUMB. All right.

M. GEORGE. I desire to make a statement in reference to the sixteenth sections in Mississippi. Under the law of the State and of Congress the sixteenth sections were leased for ninety-nine years. Nearly all the sixteenth sections were leased before the war, and where the title had vested and the money had been loaned, in nearly every instance the fund was lost by the general insolvency arising from the war. That is the fact about it.

Mr. PLUMB. I have said nothing about what has become of these lands. I have no doubt that, like the fund which was given to States under the act of 1837, much of it has been misappropriated and lost.

Mr. GEORGE. It was not misappropriated.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, lost, then, by misadventure.

Mr. GEORGE. It was sold, and the money loaned to good and solvent men at the time they borrowed it; but when pay-day came they were nearly all bankrupt.

Mr. PLUMB. Some of the Southern States have had besides swamp land and indemnity for swamp lands, and those swamp lands, as we all know now, were largely good agricultural lands. They were granted to the several States upon the theory that they not only needed reclamation, but that the States themselves stood ready with money to reclaim them. That reclamation never has been made, and the lands have been used for the purpose of swelling the revenues of the several States. I do not speak of this to complain of it, but I speak of it simply as showing that those States have had benefits from the national Treasury which more than equal those which have been had by the Western States.

Alabama has had already, or is in process of now getting, 479,500 acres; Arkansas, 8,652,000; Florida, 15,656,000 acres; and I have a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in which he says that the claim of Florida adds to that by nearly 3,000,000 acres, amounting to about 18,000,000 acres for the State of Florida. Illinois has 3,000,000; Indiana, 1,000,000; Iowa, 3,000,000; Louisiana, under the act of 1849, has 10,817,000, and under the act of 1850 543,000 acres; Mississippi, 3,070,000 acres; Missouri, 4,719,000 acres; and so on.

In addition to that those States had their distributive shares each of them of the fund of 1837. That table is contained in the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire, and if there is no objection I will incorporate it into mine only for the purpose of showing that there is no foundation for the charge that the Western States admitted since 1846 have had any advantage from the national Treasury or from the common fund, either in lands or money, that all the Southern States have not equally had.

The fact is, in the race for appropriations I think the general result is a pretty even divide.

Mr. President, it is not money that the Southern States lack, it is the spirit to do the work and to make the necessary sacrifice. You may give them from the national Treasury not only $77,000,000, but ten times seventy-seven million, and every dollar you give them will be not a help to education, but actually a disaster to it. Money does not educate people. Education is born of the determination to know, of that keen instinct quick to discern the advantage of knowing, followed by the determination to put forth every effort and to use every appliance in order that the requisition may be made. Is the native sitting under the bread-fruit tree of the equatorial region, who has only to open his mouth and it is filled, thereby stimulated to exertion? Will the South hanging upon the national Treasury fund for school purposes, and justifying itself by the claim that the North owes this money to it because slavery was abolished, and that therefore you are getting your own, be likely to be stimulated to the effort without which there can be no effective education?

No, Mr. President, the passage of this bill and the distribution of this money is a serious blow to the educational system of the South. What it needs is the stimulus of self-help; and in the four or five years last past, during which time I have given attention to this subject, I am glad to say that the South is increasing year by year its expenditures for school purposes, and the cause of education has been sensibly quickened. If let alone and allowed to stand upon its own resources and not encouraged to believe that it can hang like a leech upon the national Treasury it will continue to increase the scope and efficiency of its system, stimulated by a rising appreciation of the necessity of education for all its people, and as it widens the foundation of the structure, as it adds school-house by school-house, teacher by teacher, out of the money that it has earned, and which it must earn before it can pay, it will find that a structure thus built will be enduring to the end, and will not be shaken by storms or undermined by neglect; and it is only such a system as that which can be of any value to the South or to anybody else.

There are places in the State of Massachusetts where there are more illiterates than there are in the State of Kansas, and places in the State of Massachusetts where there are more illiterates than there are in certain places in the Southern States. Kansas has a less proportion of illiterates than Massachusetts by more than 60 per cent. That does not necessarily mean that the great body of the people of Kansas are more intelligent than those of Massachusetts. There is a certain amount of illiteracy that can not be removed. The millennium will not come this year. There will always be people who can not read and write. There is a certain amount of froth upon the surface of every great swiftly-flowing river. The illiteracy prevailing in Massachusetts can not be materially reduced by levying taxes, just as it can not be considerably reduced in Kansas. In other words, both States have substantially got to the maximum of what money will do. The illiteracy is one of importation, and not of local origin.

So in the South there is the illiteracy which the war found there, the black people of the age of fifty, sixty, seventy-five, and even a hundred years. No amount of money will ever remove that. It is not intended while they are used as the basis of this distribution that they shall ever have any of the benefit of it. But as these are eliminated from time to time, and as the people down there are inspired by their appreciation of the need of universal education, not only as a good in itself, but as a means to pecuniary prosperity, all other kinds of illiteracy will disappear as well.

I am glad to bear testimony to the courageous men on the other side of this Chamber who put aside as unworthy of them that portion of this fund which goes to their States. Look at Alabama, for instance, lying between two great systems of navigable waters. There is more coal and more iron in the space of 125 miles between the upper waters of the Tennessee, flowing into the Ohio, and the waters of the Big Warrior, leading into the Gulf of Mexico, than there is in the entire State of Pennsylvania. The taxable values of that State are increasing by more than $7,000,000 each year. Every year it is more and more becoming a great factor in the iron production of this country, and every year the people of that great State are pluming themselves on the fact that they are running a race with Pennsylvania in the production of iron and coal.

More favorably located than Pennsylvania, with water courses open all the year round that touch the borders of their great iron and coal production, do they want money out of the national Treasury? Are they willing while they make advertisement to the people of the world of their richness in all material resources, of their energy and their ambition, that it shall be accompanied by a statement that "while we are thus rich, the people that come within our borders must be prepared either to educate their own children or to join us in a raid upon the Treasury of the United States because we have not got the money to do it ourselves?"

I know the people of that State do not want it. I know the people of Georgia do not want it. I know that those people left to themselves, away from the devices of politics and politicians, putting aside with the contempt which it deserves this talk about the debt of the North to the South, will always say they do not want it; and I prophesy that if this bill does not become a law in this Congress it will never receive one-third of the votes of this body in any other Congress.

If I believed the South was engaged in a vain struggle, liable to be ingulfed under the ignorance of its population, that it had exhausted every resource which a spirited people could put forth for the purpose of meeting it, then I should say not only appropriate this money for eight years, but I should say, considering these people as absolutely dependent, let us adopt a system not for to-day nor for eight years to come, but for all the coming time, to meet that poverty which can not supply means of education—than which no poverty can be more abject.

A people who have got railroads, who have got rich and fertile lands, in a favorable climate, near to markets, can never be so poor that they can not take from their labor enough to educate their children and leave them an abundance with which to fill their stomachs and clothe their backs. Poverty of that sort is not the poverty of inability but that of sloth. The people of Kansas, who have taxed themselves, who have mortgaged the future, who have borne every burden willingly in order that their children might have a better education than they themselves had, ought not to be levied upon to make up for the sloth and indifference of a people who are not willing to tax themselves in order that they may have equal advantages.

When there is a flood on the Lower Mississippi Congress is appealed to and responds in generous appropriations; but there have been misfortunes to the people of Kansas and Nebraska far more devastating than any flood that ever overflowed the banks of the Mississippi River; and yet picking up fresh courage from every new misfortune, asking nothing from any one but simply planting their feet more firmly upon the ground, addressing themselves to the great problem before them with more zeal and earnestness and determination they have surmounted every misfortune. It was because they had the spirit of determination, because they had courage, because they had industry that they succeeded, and without these there can be no education, there can be no civilization; and donations bring neither education nor civilization.

I ask Northern Senators if they will vote to tax the many small farms, the many shops and forges already bearing the largest proportionate burden of taxation imposed, as they always do, the money necessary to carry out the provisions of this bill? If they do, let them consider well of their reasons. And why levy a great burden on the Territories denied admission as States, struggling with all the adverse circumstances attending new and frontier settlements? Is it manly thus to impose on them? Let not this injustice be done in the sacred name of education.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, there is nothing that affords a greater contrast than the plain, simple fact when contrasted with declarations of theory and opinion. There have been grave questions made in regard to this bill, and an examination of the merits of the people of the respective States and sections has been largely entered upon. It has been said that the illiteracy in some portions of the country is due to the fault of the people there; that there is abundant ability, taxable sources of revenue, to sustain a proper system of public instruction throughout the States where it prevails.

Suppose we leave that subject for one moment and consider that the United States collected from the people of the Southern States, where the greatest need for aid to education exists, between sixty and seventy million dollars without authority of law and paid it into the Treasury of the United States, and that it still remains there, the property of the people from whom it was taken. What is the result and what the obligation of that fact? What matters it what superiority there may or may not be in different portions of this country, if that fact be true, and if there is illiteracy and there is a need of education, what is the constitutional objection, or the moral objection, or the political objection to the payment of that money, unlawfully in the Treasury of the United States and taken from the people of these Southern States? But we have grave constitutional arguments here to show that while that money did get into the Treasury by the operations of the Government, that while it got there by the exercise of the constitutional powers of the Government, although unlawfully exerted, yet there is no constitutional power to pay it out, even for purposes which concern the people of all the States.

I think that fact is a sufficient answer to the Senator from Kansas and to his objections to this bill, that here is a large sum of money taken from the people of the States where illiteracy most prevails, at a time when their industries were disordered, when there was no power to resuscitate all the various sources from which industry derives its support, while there was no power to direct efficiently the labor of the country, and still held by the national Treasury.

But it is not necessary to enter into a discussion of the questions raised by the Senator from Kansas. It is idle to deny the fact that a great war had destroyed the relations of society, the relations of industry; that it had destroyed the values of property, and that those people have not yet recovered from that war. Be the fact what it may in regard to the superior economies of the people of Kansas or any other State it does not touch the question that the result of the great civil war left the Southern people and the Southern States with disordered industry, with landed property which had no convertible value in money, and that its effects still remain; and that no people, either in Kansas or anywhere else in the world, have ever striven with more economy, with more industry, nor appropriated their means with more liberality to the great burden of education that came upon them from these circumstances.

The figures which the Senator from New Hampshire has furnished and has had printed in the RECORD abundantly evidence that fact; they abundantly establish the present needs of the country, the fact that there is an increasing illiteracy throughout the country, the fact that there is a necessity for a greater application of money than can be obtained from the taxable resources of the people of these States, and it is with that question and its consequences that we are called upon to-day to deal.

How do we approach that question? We find the gravest constitutional objections urged against this bill. Senators can find in this simple appropriation of money not so great as the sum belonging to them in the Treasury to be accepted or rejected by the States at their will, to be applied through their own State officers, and with the requirement only of a condition applicable to all appropriations and grants of public money, that it shall be applied to the purpose for which it is intended. They find in this simple fact a grave constitutional objection, that it interferes with the autonomy of the States, that it is destructive of their sovereign power of legislation, that it invades the barrier interposed by the Constitution between State and Federal power, that although money was appropriated to purchase Louisiana and a part of Texas, although the people were taxed to buy Alaska, and although neither of these acts is pretended to be within the specific grants of power, for which alone under the argument of the objectors to this bill, money can be appropriated, yet no power can be found to apply the money realized from taxes in aid of education even with the consent of the States where it is to be expended.

Nothing, I think, will more clearly establish how futile these ideas are than the fact that it has been regarded as a proper subject of State and Federal power that a State might cede its territory to the United States. The State of Texas ceded to the United States for a consideration paid in money enough empire to make two or three States. The power was found in the Constitution for that, and where was it found? Can it be said that the right of a State and the Federal Government to make a compact by which the territory of the State is surrendered to be held at the discretion of the National Government is less dangerous to State autonomy than the power to accept a gift? There is no discretion or limitation either upon the State or upon the Government of the United States. If they may cede their territory by a compact and it be accepted, they may extinguish the State government entirely. If there is a power for a part there is a power for the whole, and it will not do to construe the Constitution upon any such narrow and impracticable ideas as these.

Time and again the power of a State and the Federal Government to make a compact by which the State ceded her territory to the United States has been recognized and affirmed, and it creates no apprehension and no alarm; but manifestly I reiterate such a power may be so used as to be absolutely destructive of the theory of an indestructible State.

How, then, shall we construe the Constitution? Simply by the proposition that it contains two great principles, the one of national government and national authority and the other of State authority, and that neither can as a matter of power interfere with the other. This construction of the Constitution has prevailed throughout the whole history of this Government. None other is practicable.

We find as the result of this that the public domain of the United States, estimated to be 1,849,000,000 acres, cost for the purchase $322,049,000, paid by the Government of the United States out of the taxable revenues of the country, paid by taxes imposed upon the people of the United States under the powers of the Constitution.

COST PER ACRE OF THE PUBLIC DOMAIN—PURCHASE AND CESSIONS.

The entire public domain contained (estimated) cessions, 259,171,787 acres; purchases, 1,593,139,200 acres; total, 1,852,310,987 acres; cost, $88,157,389.98, which is 4¾ cents per acre.

Purchases—cost, $81,957,389.98; contained 1,593,139,200 acres; cost 5 1/10 cents per acre.

Louisiana purchase—cost, $27,267,621.98; contained 756,961,280 acres; cost 3⅗ cents per acre.

East and West Florida, from Spain—cost, $6,489,768; contained 37,931,520 acres; cost 17 1/10 cents per acre.

Mexico, Guadalupe Hidalgo—cost, $15,000,000; contained 334,443,520 acres; cost 4½ cents per acre.

Texas purchase, 1850—cost $16,000,000; contained 65,130,880 acres; cost 24 7/10 cents per acre.

Mexico, Gadsden purchase, 1853—cost $10,000,000; contained 29,142,400 acres; cost 34 3/10 cents per acre.

Alaska from Russia, 1867—cost, $7,200,000; contained 369,529,600 acres; cost 1 9/10 cents per acre.

State cessions, from Georgia—cost, $6,200,000; contained 56,689,920 acres; cost 10 9/10 cents per acre.

The United States has disposed of (estimated) 547,754,483.88 acres of public domain, exclusive of Tennessee, and received therefor, net, $200,702,849.11, or nearly 36⅔ cents per acre.

The public domain contains (estimated) 1,852,310,987 acres, and cost for purchase, Indians, survey, and disposition, $322,049,595.96, or about 17⅓ cents per acre.

We find that vast portions of this money have passed by donation accepted by the States to all of the States, and the distinction that can be drawn between the injury to the States in accepting the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and the public lands themselves and the injury that will result from accepting the money derived directly by taxes manifestly has no foundation either in reason or in the experience of the country. I think that is a satisfactory reply. Three hundred and more million dollars of the taxes on the people of this country have been expended in the purchase of the public domain, and it has been appropriated in this form for educational purposes in every State in the Union, the State of Kansas receiving nearly 3,000,000 acres of this public land, worth at least $10 per acre, or about $28,000,000 of this public money, and all of the States receiving their 5 per cent., as they are to-day receiving it, of the proceeds of the sales of public lands. The State of Kansas receiving in money from this source $346,318.24.

Why shall we argue upon these questions and find constitutional difficulties, first toward paying back the money unlawfully collected from the people of the Southern States and now in the Treasury, for an object common to all for a benefit that will result to every State and to all the people of the United States. Second, why shall we find objections to giving the money in aid of education, when we find that the same money invested in the $300,000,000 of public land has been paid out to an extent twice as great as the whole amount provided to be paid in the bill?

Sir, this bill is but a small proportion of the amount that has been appropriated continuously and without objection with the consent of every State and of the people by the United States to the cause of education. It seems strange to me, with this continuous experience on the part of the Government, renewed Congress after Congress, this appropriation of a sum of money much larger in the aggregate than that now proposed to be expended, that we should still find these urgent constitutional objections to this act so common in the history of the Government and attempt to justify it by a distinction between taxes now to be levied and taxes levied in the past and then invested in public lands and then applied to the purposes of education.

We still apply the 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands paid in the Treasury every year to this benefit, accepted by the States and received by them. If it is unconstitutional to appropriate money out of the Treasury to the cause of education because it is not provided for in the Constitution, there is not one of the appropriations of the 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands that is not equally within the constitutional inhibition.

But I do not found my support of the bill upon any question of restitution to the people of the Southern States or of justice or injustice to this or that section of the Union—not because of the war or the results of the war. To-day, standing as a Senator here, I propose to legislate for the present and the future. The past is irrevocable. To my mind we stand to-day in a new generation and with new surroundings. We have a new world and new economies, and we have but two great guiding stars and principles to control us in the exercise of the powers conferred upon us, and that is the preservation of the National Government and the preservation of the States in their respective spheres of action.

I recognize the power to aid States and the power of the States to aid the National Government as within the sphere of constitutional power, and I ask the Senators who have made their arguments here denying it, I ask those who have quoted from Judge Cooley in regard to the power of the Federal and State Governments, and from Judge Marshall to the effect that the General Government can not tax for an object of State power and the State government can not tax for an object of Federal power, how is it that they pay year after year the loans made by the different States in aid of the General Government during the late civil war and the money expended by the States for the suppression of Indian hostilities?

These are each powers not enumerated in the specific grants. The States are not charged with the common defense. The Federal Government is charged with the power and duty of defending each State from war and invasion. How, then, can you recognize its power to tax its people for this Federal duty, and appropriate money to pay them for exercising an unconstitutional and prohibited power? Consent, you say, can not give power or jurisdiction.

How is it, if it be unconstitutional for the National Government to aid the States by an appropriation of money, that from the very beginning of the history of this Government the States have been paid by the National Government the money that they had used and expended and loaned in the suppression of Indian hostilities and later in the civil war in the equipment of troops and the general expenditures for the maintenance of the war?

There is no ground of argument or of reason in the proposition that there is anything in the Federal Constitution that prohibits a State or withholds power from us to aid the States in a lawful and proper way with their consent. The Constitution has prohibited any invasion of their sovereignty, and assuredly it would not be lawful for the General Government to exercise any power which it possessed to the destruction of the proper sovereignty of the States, nor would it be on the part of the States to exercise any authority to the destruction of any of the powers intrusted to the National Government. That is the only distinction which has guided the Government in the exercise of its powers, and the only reasonable one which can guide it.

But I said that we stood now with new surroundings, and what are those? We have no census and no statistical tables which can tell us the number of unemployed people in the United States. We have no means of knowing what the extent of want, what the extent of poverty, what the extent of suffering in this country is; but we know that North and South there is a want of employment for the people of the country; that agriculture alone is open to great masses of people. We find in the statistical reports even of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, where labor is more equally divided and distributed, where education and industrial education is more general than anywhere else, that by the statistics of Massachusetts even there there is a necessity for industrial education; that there is a necessity for education among some classes of the people greater than their system provides. Even there less than 50 per cent. of their people are employed; the remainder have no employment and are not producers.

We are confronted with the proposition that with the labor-saving machinery that has been invented, that with the great corporations and the great increase of corporate power everywhere in the country, there is a necessity for something that will distribute labor, for something that will diversify labor, for something that will enable the whole people of the country to relieve themselves from their present condition of poverty and of want. We find that we are in an age when the communications of the country are so rapid and quick, when by the telegraph the speed of lightning is given to thought and all nations and peoples are placed in direct and immediate communication, the power of combination is associating the laboring people of the world everywhere until they can dictate to the communities and to the sources of employment the terms of their employment.

I regard it as a favorable and an auspicious feature in the economy of this time, but it must be accompanied with education. It is a fearful power which takes the attribute that has hitherto belonged to government and gives it to an associated body of men federated throughout the world the power of directing the actions of large bodies of people. It is necessary, in my opinion, for the comfort of the laboring people, for their protection against want and suffering; but it must be accompanied with education, it must be accompanied with the power to diversify employment, it must be accompanied with that kind of education which will enable every man to be an independent factor and laborer in the community; and when the law of a relentless competition shall have made one employment unprofitable, when he or she may not be able to obtain employment there, they must be so educated that they can turn their attention to some other employment fitted for them and labor in that.

Therefore I recognize in the present condition of things a necessity for aid from the General Government wherever a State may be found that is not able to afford education to her people, and I do not regard it with any apprehension that it shall be upon such terms not interfering with the internal autonomy of the State, not interfering with her power to control education, but that it shall be upon such reasonable terms to be accepted by the State as will require that education shall be provided with the means furnished for the purpose by the Government of the United States.

It has been urged that this is a local interest, that this is a necessity for that community and for none other. I do not take such a view of the case. I consider that if there be any State within this Union now or hereafter that from any cause shall be so crippled in its resources that it can not perform for her people the functions which were retained and reserved in her constitution, to aid that State with a gift of the public money would be in the interest and for the benefit of every other State of the United States and for every other people in the United States.

I believe it is just as legitimate and as clearly wise as it was for the States of the Union in the late war to loan their money to equip troops, to expend their taxes in the maintenance of the Union, or as it was for the States to have organized troops and suppressed the Indian hostilities, and then to ask the Government of the United States that they should be reimbursed for that money. I can see no difference between the two propositions, except that here it is proposed to give this money, and it finds its justification in fact so far as the Southern States are concerned in the fact that the Government holds $77,000,000 of their money, though I do not need that. I am prepared to vote as a Senator money to aid them wherever it is necessary to maintain the existence of a State government, wherever her people are without the means to maintain that autonomy, and if it be necessary to loan money with her consent, to give money to rehabilitate that State and that people, I shall find no constitutional objections toward doing it.

But we are told that there must be self-reliance in the people, and that it is the want of self-reliance in these great communities of Southern States that has caused this lack of education. The contrast between the State of Kansas and other Western States and the Southern States has no foundation in reason. They were the centers of a large and prosperous emigration. They were the centers to which a population was crowding, with land suitable for the production of cereals ready at once to be converted into profitable agriculture; while the agriculture of the Southern States, with a peculiar population, was one that drove away this vast tide of emigration.

Pour into the Southern States the same emigration and the same people and you will find that there is no peculiarity in the soil there, or in the climate there, or in the surroundings there which will prevent the same people upon the soil of the Southern States, under the same circumstances, from producing the same results. But put a few of them there in the midst of a different population, accustomed to other processes of labor, themselves to be educated not only in the habits of free labor and free industry, but in the economies that are necessary, and put them in the midst of a population that have to be taught everything, and you will find as great a difference with the people of Kansas situated as the Southern people are as you will find between them there at this time and those in the free States.

But how is this donation of money going to affect the self-reliance of the people? I venture to affirm that the Southern people have been taxed to the utmost limits of possible payment. The values there are not convertible values. The railroads built there are built with foreign capital, under conditions of exemption from taxation for many years. In a great many if not in all cases every inducement has been held out to capital. The land is not a convertible asset. It is taxed far beyond its convertible value, for that is almost absolutely nothing. The whole amount of taxation is paid out of the labor of the people. It is not paid out of value which can be converted; it is paid out of the annual agricultural labor of the country, which is the sole resource of the people.

If this donation of money shall destroy the self-reliance of the people, how has it been that those 3,000,000 acres nearly of public land donated to the people of Kansas and this 5 per cent. upon the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, equal in value to thirty millions of dollars in the State of Kansas, has not destroyed their self-reliance? I hold in my hand the table of the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands or the surplus money in the Treasury which has been the foundation of the great systems of education in many of the Western and Northern States.

Why has not that destroyed the self-reliance of the people? Mr. President, there is no foundation for that proposition. Unquestionably, to sustain these people entirely from the national Treasury would be unwise and absurd, but a moderate appropriation to be invested properly in the encouragement of education, in the establishment of schools everywhere, in maintaining teachers for a limited time, could have no permanent effect upon the self-reliance of the people.

There are tasks too great to be accomplished by an impoverished people, and this danger is pressing upon us. A hundred million people will soon be here. They will need employment and they will need education of the head and the hand. They will need that which every despotic government has already undertaken because of the necessity to provide employment for the people. Sir, this is a necessity which will admit of no denial and no delay. Ignorance, the lack of employment, the want of capacity to earn a living will crush a stronger government than any that has ever existed in the world. The associations of labor which are telling everywhere the story of their wrongs and sufferings, the want of employment, the lack of compensation, the stern oppression which they feel, evidences, I think, to every enlightened statesman that there must be some other, some wider, some more efficient education than that now existing; and I can see no impropriety in the National Government, which has expended the proceeds of the public lands to an extent twice or three times greater than the appropriation asked for here—I can see no objection to Government aid in the midst of this necessity, with the increasing illiteracy in the South unfitting the people for the duties of citizenship or for the employments of life except the single one of an imperfect agriculture, the single one of an agriculture not in accordance with the spirit of the age, with the intelligence of the age confined to one or two staples alone, and with the utter impossibility within this generation of that ignorance being relieved.

Sir, I am in favor of appropriating money to the full extent of $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 improperly taken from the Southern States, and now held in the Treasury, for this purpose of general education, of industrial education, and I find no difficulty whatever in any of the provisions of the Constitution in giving to it my support.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think there are $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 now held in the Treasury that had been taxed out of the people of the South, I suppose out of the cotton tax. Is that what the Senator from Florida referred to?

Mr. CALL. I do not say that that justifies it in your view or in anybody's view. I would not give that for my justification.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think that money is in the Treasury. That money doubtless has been long ago expended for the general welfare, and the Senator bars himself from making any reclamation upon that fund by announcing that the Congress has a perfect right to tax South, North, East, or West for the general welfare. The money has been collected and long ago expended for the general welfare, and therefore I can not see how the Senator can get into his heart or mind to make another raid upon the Treasury to get that money out after it has been expended, having once been collected and expended for the general welfare.

I do not think that the South will ever assert any claim to that $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 on any account; but if it should ever assert a claim, it will be certain, I think, to try to pay the money back into the hands of the men who put it into the Treasury, and not to divert it to some other purpose. If the people of the South have been required to pay $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 cotton tax unconstitutionally into the Treasury of the United States, it is the plain duty of the Government of the United States to refund that money to the people who paid it, and not to take the money, and by some cy pres or eleemosynary arrangement transfer it to other people to benefit them. We have no claim to this $77,000,000 based upon that ground.

There are about $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 in the Treasury which were collected, I believe, by the confiscation of property or property which was seized in the name of the United States in the hands of owners and supposed to be confiscated. Perhaps it was not confiscated. The persons from whom that money was taken, the persons whose cotton was taken and the cotton sold under proceedings of confiscation and placed in the Treasury would have a clear right individually to go upon the Treasury of the United States and to ask us to vote the money back to them in the event that the Government of the United States had no right to take it. But in that case also the money ought to go back to the hands of the people from whom the cotton was taken, and not take their money and convert it into a general fund for the education of somebody else. That is not the proper way to treat claimants against the Government of the United States.

There are a great many honest and just claims against the Government of the United States now being pressed here. We voted on some to-day; a great many are to be voted upon; many millions of dollars have been voted, but we never once thought that because that money had found its way into the Treasury of the United States, or because the Government of the United States was indebted to those people, therefore we had the right to take the funds which we found there and appropriate them to any purpose that we saw proper. We pay the money back to the men who suffered, to the men who put it in the Treasury, and it would be just as bold a usurpation and as great a robbery for the Government of the United States to take a private citizen's money and give it to another man as it would be to take that $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 that the people of the South have paid, people I will say of the Gulf States, and pay it for the education of people in the Middle States.

That is all the reply I propose to make to the Senator from Florida about this matter, but while I am on my feet I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire on the 17th of this month:

> The Legislature of Alabama, the Senator's own Legislature, has done it unanimously.

That is to say, instructed the Senators from that State to vote for this bill. It struck me with a good deal of astonishment that a Senator should make a statement of that kind on this floor which at the moment I was unprepared to answer. I knew I had never received any such instruction, nor had I ever heard of it; but the Senator of course knows more about the business of my people than I do myself. He doubtless understands not only the business but the necessities and the welfare and all that belongs to the people of Alabama better than I do. And there is one great consolation to me in this new style of legislation that we are starting on, and that is that the people of Alabama after all will have the benefit of the talent and the industry and the benevolence of the Senator from New Hampshire in the management of their local affairs. That, sir, is a boon which I could scarcely reject without being guilty even of impropriety, to say nothing of impoliteness.

Now, let us see what the Legislature of Alabama has actually done. I read from a dispatch in a paper published in Montgomery, which referred to a statement made by my colleague that he was voting in obedience to the instructions of his State on this bill, which proceeds to say:

> At its session of 1882-'83 the Alabama Legislature adopted the following joint memorial asking aid from the Federal Government for educational purposes:
> "That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State be requested to secure the passage of a bill granting aid to education in the several States on the basis of illiteracy, the amount so appropriated to be applied by the several States through their superintendents of education.
> "Approved December 11, 1882."

That is all my State has ever done, memorialized Congress asking that the Senators should advocate bills here for aid to education to be paid to the cause of education through the State superintendents. The Senator from Florida asks me if that is not this bill. I do not know that it is. I rather think it is not. I proceed with the editorial of this paper:

> There is a wide difference between "requesting" and "instructing" Senators, which no one understands better than Mr. Pugh, and he must therefore have been ignorant as to the exact wording of the resolution. We publish it, therefore, that he may again read it and refresh his memory.

Now, the Blair bill, as it is called, was passed two years ago by the Senate by an immense majority, a four-fifths majority, and it was a subject of discussion two years ago in Alabama in the elections to the Legislature, Congress, &c. I did not participate in the discussion at all. I was there and made some speeches in the State, but I never alluded to the Blair bill. The Legislature met last winter a year ago, the same Legislature that re-elected my colleague to the Senate. Says this paper:

There was an effort made in the last Legislature to pass a resolution indorsing the Blair bill and instructing the Alabama Senators to vote for it—

I was not there at all—

A Democratic caucus of members of both houses was called for that purpose. But the caucus was a failure. Less than a dozen members, all told, of the house and senate were present, and it was Major Wodawell, of Perry, who got up, and, picking up the speaker's gavel, rapped the little crowd to order and announced with a pleased and humorous expression on his benevolent face, "Gentlemen, this thing is a failure, and is declared adjourned sine die." This was the end of all further efforts during the session to get up a sentiment in favor of the Blair bill.

That is the whole story about this affair in my State, and here I stand alarmed at the idea that my Legislature had actually instructed me to vote for the Blair bill and never had the grace to communicate the instructions to me. I was very much more alarmed when I looked over the Senate files and found Senate bill 2642, introduced by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] by request, the first section of which I will read. I was really alarmed that perhaps my Legislature might have instructed me to vote for this bill of the Senator from New Hampshire, which has relation to a kindred subject.

A bill granting lands to aid in the establishment of an endowment for savings, to promote thrift and to assist the people to preserve themselves from sinking into or remaining in the dangerous and degraded hand-to-mouth condition of absolute and direct dependence upon current wages.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That upon the conditions hereinafter stated, and for the purpose of aiding in the establishment of an endowment for savings (to promote thrift and assist citizens of the United States to preserve themselves from sinking into or remaining in the dangerous and degraded hand-to-mouth condition of absolute and direct dependence upon current wages), there is hereby granted to the People's Real Estate Tontine, a society or company now engaged in accumulating and administering such an endowment, the right to take and hold, for the purpose of such endowment, sections of the public lands not otherwise disposed of or reserved or held by valid pre-emption or homestead right at the time of such taking, to the amount of one such section for every hundred dollars received by said company in subscriptions to its tontine year-funds, but not to exceed 1,000,000 acres in all; and whenever and as often as the said company shall prove to the Secretary of the Interior that it has in fact received subscriptions to its year-funds to the amount of $100, the said Secretary shall cause patents to be issued to said company for one such section, to be by him selected if practicable from among lands actually worth at the time at least the minimum selling price, and as nearly adjacent as may be to the sections, if any, theretofore granted to said company under this act.

I notice that that bill is now before the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BLAIR. The Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Vermont is impatient, but I am not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very patient indeed.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator has not been in the Senate all day and he is excusable for his impatience.

I find that that same bill has been introduced again and I call attention to it now for two purposes. One is that I do not want the Legislature of Alabama to instruct me to vote for that wild measure of agrarianism and communism, which is only of a piece with the bill which the honorable Senator is advocating here to-day. I am against all such measures. I am for trying to hold down the legislation of this country to reasonable and proper bounds. I am trying to keep it in the range of those objects and purposes which our fathers had in view when they adopted the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Alabama has concluded. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. DUNN, from the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 491) to provide for an American register for the steamship Caroline Miller, of Baltimore, Md.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MYRON E. DUNLAP.

Mr. NEGLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 2013) for the relief of Myron E. Dunlap; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CINNABAR AND CLARKE'S FORK RAILROAD.

Mr. PAYSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, as a substitute for the bills H. R. 2881 and 3756, a bill (H. R. 5880) granting a right of way to the Cinnabar and Clarke's Fork Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bills 2881 and 3756 laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills under the rule begins at five minutes before 1 o'clock.

IDAHO AND WASHINGTON TERRITORIES.

Mr. SPRINGER (when the Committee on the Territories was called).

I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 2889) to annex a portion of the Territory of Idaho to Washington Territory.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all of that portion of Idaho Territory north of the following boundary line, to wit, commencing at a point in the middle of the main channel of Snake River due west of the headwaters of Rabbit Creek; thence due east to the headwaters of Rabbit Creek; thence down the middle of said Rabbit Creek to its junction with Salmon River; thence up the middle of said Salmon River to the junction of Horse Creek; thence up the middle of said Horse Creek to the junction of the East Fork of said creek; thence up the middle of said East Fork of Horse Creek to the crest of the Bitter Root range of mountains, be, and is hereby, detached from Idaho Territory and is hereby annexed to Washington Territory: Provided, That the people of that portion of Idaho Territory hereby annexed to Washington Territory shall in no wise be released from the payment of their just portion of the bonded indebtedness of Idaho Territory; and in ascertaining such bonded indebtedness there shall be deducted therefrom the amount of money in the Territorial treasury at the time of the passage of this act: And provided further, That the auditor of each county wholly or partially within such portion shall, as such indebtedness may become due and payable, draw his warrant or warrants on the treasurer of his county, in favor of the treasurer of the Territory of Idaho, for such proportion of such indebtedness as the assessed valuation of the property therein shall then bear to the assessed valuation of all the property of said Territory and said detached portion.

SEC. 2. That within sixty days after the passage of this act the Territorial auditor of Washington Territory and the Territorial comptroller and Territorial treasurer of Idaho Territory shall meet at the offices of the Territorial comptroller and Territorial treasurer of Idaho Territory, at Boisé City, and shall ascertain and determine from the books and records of said offices the exact amount of said bonded indebtedness and the time when the same or any and every portion thereof shall become due, and after deducting therefrom the amount of money found to have been in the treasury at the time of the passage of this act, to fix the several proportions justly due and to become due from the several counties and portions of counties detached from Idaho and attached to Washington Territory as provided in section 1 of this act. They shall also in like manner apportion the cost of keeping the Territorial prisoners under sentence and in prison at the date of the passage of this act, at the present cost rate of keeping the same, to the expiration of their several terms of sentence; and the Territorial comptroller and Territorial treasurer of Idaho, on the first day of each month, shall make out an itemized bill of the cost of keeping said portion of prisoners, and shall certify to the correctness thereof and forward the same to the auditor of Washington Territory, who shall draw his warrant on the Territorial treasurer of Washington Territory in favor of the Territorial treasurer of Idaho Territory for the amount thereof, not to exceed the cost rate of maintaining and keeping said proportion of prisoners at the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That all insane persons who at the date of the passage of this act are accredited to that portion of Idaho Territory which is hereby annexed to Washington Territory, and who are at that time being cared for at the expense of Idaho Territory, shall be transferred to the hospital for the insane of Washington Territory.

SEC. 4. That from and after the passage of this act the government of the Territory of Idaho shall continue unimpaired, with the boundaries of said Territory changed as herein provided; and preparatory to the holding of the next general election, the governor, secretary, chief-justice, president of the council, and speaker of the house of representatives of said Territory, or a majority of them, shall subdivide the Territory into the requisite number of legislative districts of convenient size, to be composed of single counties or of several adjoining counties, so as to apportion, as nearly as practicable, the representation in each branch of the Legislative Assembly among the different districts according to population: Provided, That until otherwise provided by law, the legislative districts of that portion annexed to Washington Territory by this act shall be and remain as now fixed by law, and the number of the members composing the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory is hereby increased to fifteen members of the council and twenty-nine members of the house of representatives.

SEC. 5. That until otherwise provided by law, the judges of the supreme court of the Territory of Idaho shall subdivide said Territory into as many judicial districts as there are judges of said court, and shall in like manner assign said judges severally thereto, and designate the places therein for the holding of courts for the trial of causes and the transaction of business arising therein: Provided, That all that portion of Idaho Territory annexed to Washington Territory by this act shall form and constitute the fifth judicial district of Washington Territory until otherwise provided by the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory; and there shall be appointed therefor, by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional associate justice of the supreme court of said Territory of Washington.

SEC. 6. That all cases of writ of error or appeal heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Idaho, or that may hereafter be lawfully prosecuted from said court, may be heard and determined by said Supreme Court of the United States; and where the same arose within the limits by this act annexed to Washington Territory, the mandate of execution or of other and further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the said district court herein provided, or to the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, as the nature of the case may require; and each of said last-mentioned courts shall be the successor of the supreme court of said Territory of Idaho as to all such cases, with full power to proceed with the same and to award mesne or final process therein.

SEC. 7. That in respect of all cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of Idaho at the time of the passage of this act, arising within the limits hereby annexed to Washington Territory, the supreme court of Washington Territory and the district court for the fifth district of said Territory shall be the successors of said supreme and district courts of Idaho; and all the files, records, indictments, and proceedings relating thereto shall be transferred to said supreme and district courts of Washington Territory, respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law.

SEC. 8. That all justices of the peace, constables, sheriffs, and other officers who shall be in office within the limits of the district hereby annexed shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to continue to exercise and perform the duties of their respective offices as officers of said Territory of Washington until they or others shall be duly elected or appointed and qualified to fill their places in the manner provided by the laws in force in Washington Territory, or until their offices shall be abolished: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act the laws of Idaho shall cease to be in force in the district hereby annexed to Washington Territory, and the laws in force in Washington Territory are hereby extended over the same.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, this bill simply provides that a small strip of territory now constituting a part of the Territory of Idaho, and extending northward and dividing Washington Territory from Montana, shall be detached from Idaho and annexed to Washington Territory. The reason for this measure grows out of the physical condition of the country. It is simply the adoption of a natural boundary as against an artificial one. The present boundary is artificial. The northern part of Idaho, and indeed the main part of the State, is an almost impassable mountain barrier. There is no road through this region—only a trail by which pack trains may be conducted. The people in that portion of Idaho called the Pan Handle desire to be annexed to Washington Territory because of the greater geographical convenience. In order to get to the capital of Idaho those people living in the Pan Handle must travel from 400 to 600 miles by a circuitous route.

In the last election for Delegates from the Territory of Idaho both parties made this question of the annexation of the Pan Handle to Washington Territory an issue in their party platform, each side of course desiring to get the votes of that portion of the Territory for their respective candidates, and each of the candidates before the people for the office of Delegate pledged himself, in pursuance of the platform of his respective convention, to use his influence in Congress for the purpose of securing the annexation of that part of Idaho to Washington Territory.

The Territory of Washington has also memorialized Congress for the purpose of having that portion of the Territory of Idaho known as the Pan Handle annexed to Washington Territory. Idaho, in its Territorial Legislature in 1884–'85, also memorialized Congress for the purpose of having this portion of Idaho annexed to Washington Territory. There is, therefore, concurrence of sentiment of the Territories of Idaho and Washington, and of the Delegates from those Territories on this floor, asking that this annexation be made.

This bill provides simply for the necessary details of that annexation—the division of the debt, the distribution of the care of the insane, and the redistricting of the Territories which will be requisite in consequence of this change. There is nothing in the bill that is not necessary to carry out the object of the annexation.

I will say in answer to an inquiry of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON], who sits near me, that the Delegates on this floor from Idaho and Washington have both introduced bills substantially the same as that now pending.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. One Territory wants to get rid of this portion and the other Territory wants to get it?

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the result.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I think their wishes ought to be gratified.

Mr. SPRINGER. But there is another feature of the case to which I desire to call the attention of the House before this bill is acted upon. Although the people of these Territories with such unparalleled unanimity at the time of the election desired this annexation to take place, it has come to my knowledge and the knowledge of the Committee on the Territories since this bill was reported that a large portion of the people in the middle of Idaho and some in that part of the Pan Handle proposed to be detached have recently changed their minds, and wish the present boundaries of their Territories to continue. I have not thought that this opinion unofficially expressed by petitions should in this case have any weight with this House. If the people of Idaho have made an agreement, with a full knowledge of the facts, for the purpose of accommodating that portion of the Territory remote from the seat of government, and have pledged their faith to have this annexation carried out, I think it is too late now for them to retract, after both parties have gone before the people at a popular election upon this solemn pledge in their respective platforms. I believe in the ethics of that good man mentioned in the Scriptures who, though he promised to his hurt, still kept his promise good. That is what these people should do. If they have promised to their hurt (and I do not believe they have) they should keep their promise. That promise is carried out in this bill. The change will certainly conduce to the convenience of that portion of Idaho that is to be annexed to Washington Territory.

I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL], the chairman of our committee, who desires to make a statement.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state, for the information of the House, that when this bill was pending before the Committee on the Territories all the information that the committee had was to the effect that there was a unanimous sentiment in the Territory of Idaho in favor of this annexation scheme. Acting under that impression, and having before us bills introduced by the Delegates from Washington and Idaho both providing for the same object, and also a memorial from the Legislatures of the respective Territories passed some years ago asking for the same thing, the Committee on the Territories had no alternative but to present a unanimous report to the House in favor of the passage of this bill. But since that report has been made information has come to me, which I believe to be reliable, that this public sentiment in the Territory of Idaho was worked up by local politicians for the purpose of carrying a Territorial election. For instance, two years ago the Republicans elected a Delegate to Congress from that Democratic Territory, because the Democrats of the Pan Handle, so called, voted for the Republican candidate, and the Republicans of the southern portion of Idaho, while opposed to this annexation scheme, told their Delegate, for the purpose of securing the Democratic votes, to go and pledge himself for it anyhow; and by that trick he was elected. Last fall the Democrats were determined not to be beaten by that game, and so both candidates were instructed by the people of Southern Idaho to pledge themselves for this annexation in order to redraw the party lines in Northern Idaho. It was a dishonest scheme on the part of both of them, and there was no feeling in it. They do not want that country annexed, as I believe.

Now, that is all there is of it. I propose, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned now, to let the House have this opinion and to throw the responsibility of severing and dismembering this Territory on the Delegate from that Territory and on the Delegate from the Territory of Washington.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will now yield the floor to the Delegate from Washington Territory [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Speaker, I stand in the presence of this House, in the presence of the people I represent, and in the presence of the people of Idaho, and assume all the responsibility attaching to the favorable consideration of this measure. I stand here prepared to assert that ever since the organization of the Territory of Idaho, in its present form and shape, by the organization of the Territory of Montana in 1864 there has been a very deep-seated, widespread, and oft-expressed desire on the part of the people of North Idaho for the favorable consideration of a measure of this kind. The period of which I speak extends over nearly twenty-two years, during all of which time there never has been an expression made in the political conventions of either of the Territories of Idaho or Washington relating to this subject which did not declare unequivocally in favor of the passage of such a measure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in order that we may understand just how much of a dishonest scheme this measure embodies, I desire to read from a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Idaho Territory, passed no longer ago than the session of 1884–'85, which voices the sentiment of the people of the Pan Handle on this proposition. I may state, in connection with this memorial, that the nine members of the Territorial Legislature representing the Pan Handle of Idaho voted unanimously for its adoption. I would not take up the time of the House in discussing the subject at any length were it not for the effort which has evidently been made to create the impression that there is some dishonest scheme in connection with this measure.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Washington Territory will understand that I do not impute that to any Delegate or Member of this House.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not understand that the gentleman did, as a matter of course. I desire to place the memorial before the House as showing the sentiment of the people of Idaho, and not with any hostile feeling toward the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Territories.

This is council joint memorial No. 2, headed annexing Idaho, Nez Percés, Shoshone, and Kootenai Counties to Washington Territory.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the council and house of representatives of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Idaho, respectfully represent that all of that portion of said Territory which comprises the counties of Idaho, Nez Percés, Shoshone, and Kootenai, and is included in the boundaries hereinafter set forth, and constituting what is known as North Idaho, is so situated in relation to the southern and southeastern portion of said Territory as to render their political union impracticable, for the reason that nature has divided them by a high and rugged range of mountains, over which there is no road, except such as will admit of the passage of riding and pack animals, and this only for about six months of the year; during the remaining six months the snow is so deep as to cut off all communication between said sections, except by telegraph or travel by a circuitous route through Washington Territory, across the Umatilla Indian reservation and through the State of Oregon, a distance of some 700 miles, this being the shortest route by which the people of the north can reach Boisé City, the capital of the Territory, except it be on horseback or on snow-shoes.

Politically the two sections are united, but socially, commercially, and geographically they never can be.

We, your memorialists, therefore respectfully pray that when the Territory of Washington is admitted as a State into the Union, all that portion of the Territory of Idaho hereinafter more particularly described be attached to and made a part of said State of Washington, to wit: Commencing at a point in the middle channel of Snake River, at the northwest corner of Washington County, in Idaho Territory; thence easterly along the northern boundary line of said Washington County to where said boundary line crosses the Salmon River range of mountains; easterly along the summit of said Salmon River range of mountains to the eastern boundary line of Idaho County; thence northerly along the eastern boundary line of said Idaho County to the summit of the Bitter Root range of mountains; thence in a general northerly course along the summit of the Bitter Root range of mountains to the thirty-ninth meridian line west longitude from Washington, D. C.; thence north along said meridian to the forty-ninth parallel of latitude; thence west along said parallel to the western boundary line of Idaho Territory, and thence southerly along said western boundary line to the place of beginning.

And we would further ask that in the event of the disintegration of the part of Idaho Territory mentioned, the common debt be adjusted and provision made for the support of such convicts as are now in the Territorial penitentiary, and for the support of the persons adjudged insane in said counties of Idaho, Kootenai, Shoshone, and Nez Percés.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

This is the language of the people of the Territory of Idaho asking this measure of justice at the hands of the American Congress.

Let us see whether the people of Northern Idaho do not desire the favorable consideration of this measure. When Mr. Singeiser, an ex-Delegate in this House, was a candidate before the people, it was generally understood and intimated that he had pledged himself in these northern counties to labor diligently and assiduously for the passage of this measure. His opponent was understood to be determined to antagonize any such efforts. The result was that Mr. Singeiser got all but about 400 votes in that portion of the Territory out of an aggregate of 1,600 or 1,800.

That was in the campaign of 1882. Mr. Singeiser did not receive any such vote in this portion of the Territory when before the people as a candidate at the last Congressional election for the reason that his efforts in the matter of annexation had not been during his term in Congress commensurate with his pledges to the people of North Idaho. This is the second memorial, Mr. Speaker, which has passed the Territorial Legislature of Idaho. Only three or four years after the Territory was so irregularly shaped by the carving out of it of the Territory of Montana a similar request was made of Congress. During the campaign of 1884, in the platforms of both of the political parties of Idaho and Washington, there was a declaration in favor of this measure. There has never been an expression of public sentiment, in or out of political conventions, or in or out of the Territorial Legislatures of either of these Territories, adverse to the favorable consideration of this measure.

There is an impassable range of mountains known as the Salmon River range, which entirely isolates and cuts off this portion of Idaho from the southern portion of the Territory. I am actuated by no other consideration in the world in my advocacy of this measure except a desire to meet the wishes of the people who have been cut off from all communication and association with their fellows commercially, geographically, socially, and politically for more than twenty years, and who have been for so many years insisting on favorable action on a measure of the character of the one now pending, as well as to represent the intelligently expressed wishes of the people who sent me here. I would be recreant to the pledges made to the people whom I have the honor to represent on this floor did I not denounce with all the power I can command any suggestion, come from whatever source it may, that there is anything dishonest, directly or indirectly, in connection with this measure.

It simply declares the will of the people. It seems to me we are assembled here for the purpose of meeting the will of the people when we can ascertain just what that will is. How any one can suggest a better idea of ascertaining the wishes of these people than through the expression of the people's representatives it is difficult for me to understand, and, so far as this measure is concerned, I have given you that expression in the memorial which I have read. A similar memorial was passed by the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory in 1873 and was presented to this House.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that any proposition for the benefit of Idaho Territory or for the benefit of Washington Territory which might be suggested for the consideration of this House would arouse opposition from some source or other. Unanimity upon any proposition is of course impossible. If a bill were pending before this House to organize a Territory of Utopia, full of all the bright dreams of perfection and glory which could emanate from the brain of the most talented theorist, somebody most likely would rise to object. As indicative of the capacity of the average human being to object to a given proposition, whether good or bad, I recall a suggestion made by a member of this House some years ago in response to some untenable objection to the pending proposition, that if the objectors on that occasion had been present when Christ delivered His Sermon on the Mount they would have objected to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, in view of the unanimous and overwhelming sentiment in Idaho Territory as well as in Washington Territory in favor of this measure, it seems to me that there ought to be no doubt whatever as to what the action of this House should be.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. How many voters are in the portion of Idaho that it is proposed to annex to Washington Territory?

Mr. VOORHEES. About 2,788, making, on the basis of 4.7 which has been for some years past the ratio of population to vote in Washington Territory, a population of 13,103. These figures relate to the 4th day of November, 1884. The increase in population has been large since that date.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is there any question as to the fact that the people living in this portion of Idaho desire to be attached to Washington Territory?

Mr. VOORHEES. There is absolutely no question as to that in my opinion. I have had that proposition presented to me in such varied shapes that I can not possibly think there is any difference of opinion in reference to it either in Washington or Idaho Territory.

There are one or two amendments which I desire to move to the bill at the proper time, embodying no new legislation, but merely correcting one or two minor errors.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose in a moment, but for the present I wish to yield to the Delegate from Idaho [Mr. HAILEY].

Mr. HAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say but little on this question. This Pan Handle of Idaho, about which there has been so much talk, has been a bone of contention for the last twenty years. A large majority of the people living in that portion of the Territory have wanted annexation to Washington Territory. There is no doubt about that fact in my mind. The people of the southern portion of Idaho, however, have objected to it until the last two years. Up to that time their objection was a serious one. Three years ago last fall the people of the north were so embittered against the people of the south because they could not be annexed that both political parties in these northern counties refused to participate in the Territorial conventions. They called an independent convention for the purpose of nominating a man to run on the annexation question with a view of sending him to Washington city to work for the annexation of those counties to Washington Territory whether he was elected or not. But the Republican candidate was a little sharper than the Democratic candidate, and he rushed up north and pledged himself to go for annexation, and they took him as their candidate with the understanding down south, I am told by good authority, that he did not intend to work very hard for it. [Laughter.]

However, he secured almost the unanimous vote of these northern counties, and was elected. But although he was elected, he did not secure their annexation. At the recent election, or rather at the conventions which preceded the election, the Republicans placed a section in their platform pledging their party to do all in their power to secure the annexation, and their Delegate also was pledged to do whatever was in his power, if elected, to annex these northern counties to Washington Territory. The Democratic party took the matter under advisement, talked it over, and after some consideration of the subject, concluded that they also would put the same plank in their platform, or substantially the same thing, favoring this annexation. I gave them due notice that if that plank was inserted in the platform and they nominated me, that if elected I would try to give this portion of the Territory away to Washington Territory.

I now propose to keep good the pledges made by my party and myself by trying to have them annexed to Washington Territory. They have expressed a desire to go to Washington, and I do not propose to keep them from going; they have been very troublesome. I hope the bill will pass to annex them to Washington Territory, because we can get along very well without them. It has been clearly understood for years that the people of those counties themselves wanted to be annexed to Washington Territory. The Legislature in 1885 passed a memorial requesting that these counties be annexed to Washington Territory, but with the proviso that they should pay their portion of the debt of the Territory just as this bill provides.

Now at this late date some of these northern counties, I understand, are kicking about it when they find that they can really be annexed to Washington Territory, and they do not want it near so bad as they thought they did. Some of them say they prefer to go to Montana Territory, and for that reason they send in here and oppose the passage of the bill which proposes to give to them the very thing they have been asking for for so many years, and I therefore insist upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Will the gentleman from Idaho yield for a question?

Mr. HAILEY. Certainly, sir.

Mr. REED, of Maine. In the time away back when they had politics in Northern Idaho, what was ordinarily the result when they took sufficient interest in elections to vote their sentiments?

Mr. HAILEY. It was, in the early days, Democratic by a small majority. That was before this question arose——

Mr. REED, of Maine. But not since?

Mr. HAILEY. No, sir, not recently; that is to say, in the last few years. Three years ago, the election before the last, the Republican candidate got about fourteen hundred majority.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is on account of having adopted a Territorial annexation platform.

Mr. HAILEY. Two years ago the Republican candidate got several hundred majority, because most of them did not believe that I was in earnest when I stated that I was going to give these counties away as they had been insisting upon for so long; and I want to say now that I am going to keep my pledge.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the gentleman from Idaho permit me to answer the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. HAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will answer the question by saying that the only politics in these northern counties of Idaho, and it has been unanimous for twenty years, is in favor of this annexation. That has been the only question.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But on a straight party ticket?

Mr. HAILEY. On a straight party ticket the parties are about evenly divided in this portion of the Territory.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Montana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman to yield the floor to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield ten minutes of the time to the gentleman from Montana, if the gentleman from Idaho has concluded.

Mr. HAILEY. I have concluded what I desired to say.

Mr. TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a few remarks upon the proposition embraced in this bill, not with a view of interfering with the desire of the people of Idaho in disposing of that portion of their territory embraced within what is called the Pan Handle, but for the purpose of presenting some considerations which would seem to demand that all that portion of the Pan Handle north of the forty-seventh parallel should be annexed to the Territory of Montana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana will please suspend until order is restored on the floor.

Mr. TOOLE. As was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, the only information which came to that committee upon this subject before their report was made to the House was to the effect that the people of Idaho Territory, without reference to party, desired that all that portion of Idaho which has been referred to as the Pan Handle should be annexed to Washington Territory. Acting upon that information, and that information only, the bill now before the House was reported back unanimously recommending its passage. It is only fair to the House that they should be fully advised of the present desire of the people of that portion of the Pan Handle lying north of the forty-seventh parallel, as expressed by them since the committee had the same under consideration.

The citizens of that country residing within the district known as the Cœur d'Alene Mining Company, which is north of the forty-seventh parallel, have recently held public meetings and demonstrations for the express purpose of considering the propriety and desirability of being annexed to Washington Territory, and after full and free discussion there was but one sentiment, and that was to be annexed to the Territory of Montana. The meeting held for that purpose at Murray, in the Territory of Idaho, formulated and submitted to me a memorial to be presented to Congress asking the annexation to Montana instead of to Washington Territory. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who has charge of this bill, has stated to the House that the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Idaho in several joint memorials have asked the annexation of this portion of Idaho to Washington Territory, and that both political parties of the Territory have embraced in their late platforms a plank which committed them to this action, and that they are now bound by it. He seems to present this matter to the House as if the action of the Legislative Assembly and of the several conventions was a contract, and that the parties interested were estopped from ever changing their minds in this respect. If there was an element of consideration or mutuality involved in it, then I submit that the Territory of Washington ought to be remitted to a court of equity to compel its specific performance.

It sometimes happens that declarations are put into platforms for ulterior purposes and without any purpose of carrying them into execution. I do not say that this was the case at the time the resolutions referred to by the gentleman from Illinois were adopted, but that this thing does sometimes occur. I recall the fact that the two great political parties of this country in their late national conventions inserted a plank in their several platforms which provided that all appointments in the Territories should be made from actual residents therein; and yet, in the light of subsequent events, it will not be contended by the most punctilious political observer that they ever meant what they said. And, if there is any imputation in this declaration of trifling with more than a million people in the Territories, it applies with equal force to the present and preceding administrations; but there is nothing in analogies, nor do I cite this as such. The proposition under consideration is simply this: That since the last conventions referred to by the gentleman from Illinois were held, and within the last two weeks, the people of the Cœur d'Alene country, who ought to be consulted, have held public meetings for the sole purpose of giving expression to their views upon this question of annexation, and have said that it is their unanimous desire to be annexed to the Territory of Montana. I present a memorial from those people to Congress upon this subject and ask that it be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk proceeded to read the memorial.

Mr. SPRINGER (interrupting the reading). The gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE] advises me that he prefers to occupy the time which can be allowed him in making his remarks in addition to what is contained in the petition, and I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of it be printed in the RECORD as part of the gentleman's remarks.

There was no objection.

The petition in full is as follows:

A petition to the Congress of the United States.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

At a mass meeting of the people of the Cœur d'Alene mining region (at which all classes and localities in that region were fully represented) held at Murray, Shoshone County, Idaho, on February 6, 1886, to consider the whole question of annexation, it was resolved that all of the material interests of the people of Idaho, living north of the forty seventh degree of north latitude, require that the territory north of such parallel shall be annexed to the Territory of Montana, and the undersigned were appointed a committee to briefly present to your honorable bodies the reasons why we desire to become a portion of Montana, and why we object to being annexed to Washington Territory.

Pursuant to such resolution the following is respectfully submitted:

North of the Salmon River Mountains Idaho consists of a series of mountain basins, separated by mountain spurs, which branch off from the Bitter Root range and run to the west, gradually diminishing in altitude until they end in the rolling prairie region of Eastern Oregon and Washington. The Bitter Root range itself breaks down in its course to the north and ends on the shores of Lake Pend d'Oreille. From the Salmon River Mountains to the northern boundary of the United States Idaho is divided into two great hydrographic sections. The southernmost section, lying south of the forty-seventh parallel of north latitude, and embracing an area of about 13,000 square miles, is drained by Snake River, a navigable stream, on which the agricultural products of Eastern Oregon and Washington and the adjacent sections in Idaho are transported to market; while north of the forty-seventh parallel (which falls on the mountain spur which lies between the headwaters of the Clearwater and Saint Joseph Rivers, known as the Clearwater divide) the country, embracing an area of about 6,500 square miles, has a lake drainage only, with no navigable stream, and must always depend upon railway transportation alone.

The Clearwater divide separates the northern section from the southern as completely as the Salmon River range separates Northern from Southern Idaho. Every economical and political reason which demands that Northern Idaho shall be separated from Southern Idaho, and that the territory lying between the forty-seventh parallel and the Salmon River Mountains shall be annexed to Washington, equally demands that the territory lying north of that parallel shall be annexed to Montana. There is not now nor can there ever be any business or commercial relations between the two sections. The mountain barrier on which the forty-seventh parallel falls has been and is a fatal bar to all intercommunication.

We hold the people of Washington Territory in high esteem. We feel flattered by their intelligent desire to embrace within its limits this rich and growing section, but after full consideration we are persuaded that all of our material interests will be best promoted by annexation to Montana. Shoshone County is one of the most populous and casts the largest vote of any county in Idaho. Nineteen-twentieths of its population live north of the forty-seventh parallel. Murray, the county seat of the county, is within 8 miles of the Montana line, and the whole of the mining region drained by the Cœur d'Alene and Saint Joseph Rivers lies within 25 miles of that line. From Murray through the Thompson Falls Pass in the Bitter Root Mountains (over which a standard-gauge railroad can be constructed on easy grade) lies the natural thoroughfare over which our people now largely receive their supplies from the Northern Pacific Railroad in Montana, less than 30 miles distant. Probably a majority of our people are from Montana. Our business interests and commercial relations are principally with that Territory, and from the nature of our leading industries must become more and more so in the future.

Sooner or later Montana and Washington will become States in the Union. How soon the wisdom of Congress must decide. When they are so admitted it will be all-important that they shall severally have homogeneous populations with substantially similar interests, so that their general legislation may be applied without discrimination to all their industrial classes. While the section of Idaho north of the forty-seventh parallel contains large tracts of fertile agricultural land, its leading interest is and always must be that of mining for the useful and precious metals. On the other hand, Washington Territory is preeminently an agricultural and grazing country. As a part of Washington our interests would be at the mercy of a Legislature in which the non-mining interests would have absolute control. Such general legislation as an agricultural community demands would certainly be injurious and perhaps ruinous to the prosperity of a mining region. Even where hostile legislation is withheld, or defeated after strenuous effort, its possibility is a standing menace, sowing discord among the people, frequently giving rise to permanent antipathies, and sometimes to blistering hates, which cause resort to political and legislative methods which corrupt the suffrage and debauch the public conscience. This is the lesson which the experience of the Pacific coast for more than thirty years past has taught its people. We have seen and felt it too often not to have learned it.

The people of Washington would doubtless try to be just to us; but they would find it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to be so without in their judgment being unjust to themselves. This would be especially true in all matters of fiscal legislation and laws for the collection of debts. In several of the Pacific coast States and Territories this irrepressible conflict between the two interests has been sought to be appeased by special legislation. An inspection of their statute-books will show that in the matters which most concern the daily business of the people it might almost be said that each county had a separate code of laws. Special legislation, however, can offer only a partial solution of the difficulty, and owing to the extravagance and corruption which it engenders it has deservedly become odious to the people. Even special legislation might be denied us, as to our knowledge it has been denied in other Territories. If not denied by the Legislature, it would probably be prohibited by any State constitution which Washington would be likely to present or Congress to accept.

On the other hand as an integral part of Montana our interests will be in thorough harmony with those of the rest of the Territory, in which neither the mining nor any other one interest exerts a controlling influence; where special legislation is not required, and where general legislation is compelled to represent the average interests of all of the leading industries. Furthermore, Montana already has a full code of mining laws and fiscal laws which carefully protect the mining interests from the burden of unjust taxation, while Washington has (so far as we can ascertain) no mining legislation whatever, and the general terms in which its laws relating to the raising of revenue are couched would impose a ruinous taxation upon our interests. In the interregum between our severance from Idaho and the passage of legislation required by our condition by the Legislature of Washington we will be subjected to the most grievous hardships, and when the time shall arrive when such legislation will be possible, we will be confronted by opposing and perhaps hostile interests absolutely dominating the Territory.

Again, Montana possesses a Territorial judiciary trained in the special rules and principles relating to mining controversies, while Washington has one destitute of this knowledge. During the continuance of the Territorial condition of the two Territories, as a part of Montana we will have the benefit of its trained judges, while as a part of Washington all of the delicate questions relating to mining titles will have to be passed upon by a bench absolutely ignorant of the first principles of mining law. If both Territories shall be admitted as States into the Union, Montana will select the judges of its courts of original and appellate jurisdiction from its large number of able lawyers versed in all of the intricacies of mining law, while the supreme court of Washington will necessarily be composed of men ignorant of this law and whose deliberations will result in "hit-or-miss" decisions that will unsettle all of our titles and impose a fatal bar upon our progress.

In conclusion we say that the sentiment of our people is a unit in favor of our severance from Idaho and practically unanimous in favor of annexation to Montana.

Your petitioners therefore most earnestly pray that so much of the Territory of Idaho as lies north of the forty-seventh degree of north latitude may be detached from Idaho and annexed to Montana. And your petitioners will ever pray.

Mr. TOOLE. From this memorial it appears that the people of the Cœur d'Alene country have no disposition to interfere with the annexation of that portion of Idaho to Washington Territory which lies south of the forty-seventh parallel. But they insist that all of that portion of it occupied by them and lying north of the forty-seventh parallel shall be annexed to the Territory of Montana. Their reasons for this are potential and in my judgment ought to be controlling. While there is some agricultural land embraced within this portion of the Pan Handle it is essentially a mining country, while Washington Territory is essentially an agricultural country.

While Montana has great diversified interests, embracing agriculture, stock-raising, and mining pursuits, the dominant interest of the Territory is that of mining, so it will be seen that there would be a community of interests between the people of the Territory of Montana and that portion of the Pan Handle lying north of the forty-seventh parallel. Their interests and pursuits are identical, and the past legislation of the Territory of Montana, while not discriminating against other industries, has been liberal in promoting its mining interests. Its mines are exempt from taxation, its judges are conversant with mining laws, and these considerations are among others which invite the people of that portion of the Pan Handle to connect themselves with the Territory of Montana.

The people who reside in that country are largely Montanians; they left us in pursuit of fortunes, but, warm in their attachments and strong in their feelings, they have expressed the desire to return. The information which I have from Montana justifies me in saying that the people of that Territory are willing and anxious to receive the proposed addition of territory and population and will welcome their return with open arms.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE].

The SPEAKER. The amendment sent up by the gentleman from Montana has not yet been read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have not yielded for the offering of an amendment.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that this question, as may be understood from the report of the subcommittee to which it was assigned, was most fully investigated with reference to all the questions which are supposed to have a bearing upon the main question involved in the bill. And I desire to say that the subcommittee was unanimous in its view, after a full consideration of all these questions, that this annexation to Washington Territory should be made as is proposed in the bill.

Not only is that the case, but the gentlemen of the committee unanimously agreed to the report of the subcommittee, and in harmony with that action this bill has been reported to the House. As the chairman of the committee has disclosed upon the floor, it seems that he has received some protestations from gentlemen residing out there against this movement. I confess that his statements were as new to me as they were undoubtedly to the members of this House. They seem to be based on individual letters from gentlemen residing in that Territory. But, as against these, there are the resolutions which were read by the Delegate from Washington Territory and the statements made by the Delegate from Idaho Territory, and I think the evidence is conclusive that the people, or a great majority of the people, of these two Territories desire this change.

I have no doubt all politicians out there have schemes, and I have no doubt there may have been practices out there to be condemned in the interest of good morals. But the fact is, all the political scheming in which these gentlemen have engaged has not been sufficient to raise the mountains that stand there as natural barriers against the people of the north in their intercourse with the major part of that Territory of Idaho. They are hemmed in by these mountains, and nothing can change the physical conditions in that regard.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, in view of the unanimous report of the subcommittee, in view of the unanimous report of the Committee on Territories, and the harmony there has been on the subject on the part both of Democrats and Republicans, this bill ought to receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I shall yield in a moment to the Delegate from Washington Territory [Mr. VOORHEES]. But in reference to the statement made by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE] that certain persons residing in the Pan Handle of Idaho had changed their minds and now desired to be annexed to Montana Territory, I have this to say. Of course there are some persons residing in the Pan Handle of Idaho who prefer to be attached to the Territory of Montana, so that they can by means of the Northern Pacific Railroad cross the Bitter Root range of mountains and get into Montana perhaps more easily than they could get into the capital of Washington Territory. But the people in that region, through their representatives in the Legislature of Idaho, have unanimously united in a vote in favor of this bill, so that we have the official expression of the people in that region through their representatives in their own Legislature in favor of the passage of the bill now before the House, and I maintain that such official expression of views by the people, through the members of their Legislature, after a popular vote, ought not to be set aside by resolutions of irresponsible town meetings. I yield now to the gentleman from Washington, who desires to offer an amendment to this bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 18, page 4, strike out "twenty-nine" and insert "thirty."

Mr. SPRINGER. The object of the amendment, as I understand it, is to give to the Territory annexed a member of the Legislature.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is designed to conform to the districts as organized. That is all.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Speaker, I offer also another amendment, which is simply designed to pefect the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add, as section 9, the following:

"That the Cœur d'Alene land district within that portion of Idaho Territory hereby annexed to Washington Territory shall constitute the Cœur d'Alene land district of Washington Territory; and all that portion of Idaho Territory hereby annexed to Washington Territory which is not embraced within the limits of the Cœur d'Alene land district shall constitute the Lewiston land district of Washington Territory."

Mr. VOORHEES. That provision simply continues, under the new order of things, the organization which exists at present.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question.

Mr. TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have my amendment considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], as the Chair understood, did not yield to the gentleman [Mr. TOOLE] to offer an amendment, but only for some remarks. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] now demands the previous question upon the pending amendment and upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment last offered was then agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been already ordered, but the hour for the consideration of bills has expired.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. 738) for the relief of James Clifford; when the Speaker signed the same.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of business on the House Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The first business on the House Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3) to prevent the claim of the war taxes under the act of August 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereof, by the United States, as set-off against States having claims against the General Government.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, one of my colleagues who desired to engage in the debate on that bill is absent on account of illness, and it has been agreed that, if there be no objection, this bill shall be passed over for the present. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It would not lose its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection.

NORTH, CENTRAL, AND SOUTH AMERICAN EXPOSITION.

The next business on the House Calendar was the joint resolution (H. Res. 108) authorizing the several Executive Departments of the Government to loan the North, Central, and South American Exposition at New Orleans certain articles for exhibit.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to lay the joint resolution and the pending amendment on the table. On that the yeas and nays have been demanded and that demand is pending.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and, 40 members voting in favor thereof, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the joint resolution read, and also the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the joint resolution and the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That it is desirable, in any way consistent with existing laws, and without risk to Government property or expense to the National Treasury, to encourage the effort being made for the development of industry and commercial relations by the North, Central, and South American Exposition at New Orleans, and it be, and is hereby, approved that the heads of the several Executive Departments shall, in whatever respect they may in their judgment see convenient and proper, loan any articles or material suitable to such purpose: Provided, That such loan be made entirely at the expense and on the responsibility of said American Exposition, and shall not be of material needed for use in either Department and shall not in any way interrupt the daily routine of duty or order in any branch of the Government.

Amendment: "Provided further, That before either of the heads of the Executive Departments loan to said American Exposition any article or material embraced in this resolution, said American Exposition, or some one as principal for it, shall execute and deliver to the head of such Executive Department a good and sufficient bond, of approved security, in such sum as the head of such Executive Department may approve, conditioned for the proper care and safe and prompt return of such articles or material at a time to be specified in the bond."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 112, not voting 76; as follows:

Mr. REESE with Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. LAFFOON. I desire to state that my colleague, Judge HALSELL, is confined to his room by sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

LAND GRANT TO ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The next unfinished business on the House Calendar was the bill (H. R. 453) to forfeit the lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company in aid of the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the words "to disposal," in the seventeenth and eighteenth lines, and insert:

"To entry and settlement under the provisions of the homestead laws by actual settlers only, as though said grant had never been made: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to impair any right the United States may have in or to the lands embraced in said grant not declared forfeited by this act."

Mr. COBB. That last clause of the amendment, beginning with the word "provided," is in the bill and ought not to be repeated.

Mr. HOLMAN. That clause is in the bill, but is embraced within the portion which my amendment strikes out; and it is reinserted by the amendment, the object being to preserve the connection.

Mr. COBB. The same language is in the bill.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] proposes to strike out the language of the bill after certain words and to insert what has been read, the language to be inserted including a part of what is already in the bill; but if the amendment be adopted the language will be included but once.

Mr. HOLMAN. My only object was to preserve the connection of the language; and that is the effect, as my colleague will see if he examines the amendment carefully. The amendment differs from the provision of the bill in this respect only: the amendment proposes to apply to these lands the principle of the homestead law, instead of allowing them to be sold at $1.25 per acre.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I will only say that I hope this amendment will not be adopted. If such a provision be inserted in the bill, it will merely provoke discussion, and in the end, I think, kill the bill. While I do not charge that to be the object of my colleague, yet it is very clear that if any proposition of this kind be inserted controversy between the two Houses will necessarily arise, and the bill probably be defeated in the Senate. For this reason I am opposed to the amendment; and I trust the House will not adopt such a proposition, as it did on a previous bill of this nature.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are not both the Senate and the House committed to the policy of disposing of the public lands under the homestead laws, and are not both of the great political parties of the country committed to the same policy?

Mr. COBB. My colleague asks me a question whether I do not understand the Senate wishes to pass such a measure. Now, I understand the Senate is willing to vote for a measure, but a measure with other things attached to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Senate sent this bill back at the last session.

Mr. COBB. Yes; the Senate sent this bill back at the last session, but with an amendment that no one in this House would vote for.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was there any amendment to the homestead law?

Mr. COBB. Yes; they amended the homestead law.

Mr. HOLMAN. The principle of the homestead law was substantially included.

Mr. COBB. In connection with what we sent they sent back other propositions we could not vote for, and which they knew we could not vote for.

Mr. HOLMAN. But can this House afford to go back of the principle of the homestead law?

Mr. COBB. We are not going back of the principle of the homestead law. We have a bill pending, and the committee has considered it, for the purpose of repealing the timber-culture law and the pre-emption law. We will bring it before the House, and if the House will pass it, it will prevent any of the public lands being disposed of except for homestead purposes. I hope this House will be disposed to let it pass and become a law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us send this bill to the Senate in favor of homesteaders. The other law has not yet been passed.

Mr. COBB. That is the very point. I am willing to do that. I am as anxious about the homestead law as my colleague, and I have done as much as he ever did to preserve for homestead purposes the public lands of the United States. Here are lands belonging to railroad corporations, and I am trying to wrest them from the grip of these railroad corporations. I know there will be obstructions placed in the way; but I appeal to the House again to let the bill pass. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment to the amendment was again read.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 44.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The remaining amendments of the committee, heretofore published, were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the substitute for the bill as amended proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE].

Mr. PERKINS. Is debate exhausted on the pending bill and substitute?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question has not been demanded.

Mr. MCRAE. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Kansas. How many minutes does he desire?

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to take the floor for the purpose of opposing the gentleman's substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas is first entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on the Public Lands seeks to forfeit only that part of the lands granted the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company which are not conterminous with any portion of the constructed road. That will give to the railroad company all the lands along the line of the road, whether constructed or purchased by it, and will forfeit to the Government those in the Mohave Desert and which are of little or no value as compared with the other lands. Here is where the Government no doubt was most anxious to get a road when the grant was made. If you permit this corporation by a system of trading and mortgaging with the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé and the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railroad Companies to acquire title to all of these lands without complying with the conditions of the grant, leave the road uncompleted, and give the company for so small a part performance all that is of any real value to it, then you have saved nothing for the people of the country by the act of forfeiture; for if the legal argument advanced by the honorable gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] last week be correct, then the title to all these lands will be clouded until the mortgages are foreclosed, and some of them are not due until 1922 and others until 1910. Shall we leave the title thus clouded?

The substitute I offer seeks to forfeit all the lands not conterminous with any portion of the road constructed within the time provided by the grant, which was July 4, 1878. I understand only 34 miles of the road were completed within this time, and under the argument presented by the majority of the committee I insist upon the exercise of all the power vested in Congress. The committee in the report undertake to justify themselves in going beyond that by the act passed April 20, 1871, to enable the company to mortgage its road and lands.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman from Arkansas will allow me a moment I will make a correction.

Mr. MCRAE. Certainly.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that but 34 miles of the road were completed. They had completed 125 miles within the time fixed by the act. That includes that portion of the road in Missouri and 34 miles in the Indian Territory running to Venita, making 125 in all. Now he proposes, as I understand it, by his substitute to forfeit all the lands, including that in Missouri along the completed portion of the road.

Mr. MCRAE. No, sir; I propose forfeiting none of the lands conterminous with the road which was constructed within the time—that is, before July 4, 1878.

Mr. COBB. Then it would not make much difference. The number of miles completed was 125 within the time fixed by the act making the grant.

Mr. MCRAE. I do not know how much was completed. I made the statement upon information received from the chairman of the committee and supposed it was accurate. But I stand corrected now. However, it does not matter whether it was 34 miles or 125 miles completed. All of the lands conterminous with the constructed road—that is, constructed within the time fixed by the law—are lost to the Government and pass to the company or its mortgagees under the act of April 20, 1871.

Now I hold that, inasmuch as this act does not pretend to grant additional rights to the company, the mortgage thus authorized only carries a lien to such rights as the company held. The mortgage was necessarily subject to all the conditions of the granting act. So far from enlarging the rights of the company, I think the language used clearly limited the rights of the mortgagees to the lands conterminous with road constructed within time or at the time of foreclosure if made before the time for completion expired. This is to my mind the only just construction of which it is susceptible. As to the power of Congress to declare this forfeiture, I refer to the able argument of the chairman of the committee in his report upon this bill. I agree fully with him until we come to the act of April 20, 1871. Then who can tell what the courts will decide about that act? If I am correct, we have saved homes for millions of our people. If not, we have lost nothing. Shall we anticipate what the decision of the courts will be, or shall we do what we think is right toward the people and leave the courts to construe the laws?

If the argument of the gentleman who represents the company be correct, and it possibly may be, then it may be 1922 before a foreclosure of the mortgage. Shall we wait until then before we force a judicial construction of the act, and during all of that time have all of this great body of land tied up and withheld from settlement? This is necessarily the case unless Congress provides some way to test the validity of the mortgage as to the lands forfeited. Will you restore the lands to the public domain and open them to settlers, to have them and their children annoyed by these bondholders, or will you declare the forfeiture and proceed at once to adjust the differences between the Government and the bondholders?

I hold, Mr. Speaker, that it is the duty of Congress in behalf of the people to declare this grant forfeited as between the Government and the railroad company, and if the mortgagees have rights, as they doubtless have, then it is within their province, if they so desire, to go into court and adjust them. No act of ours will or can in the least prejudice their rights. But you can not protect the people without an act of forfeiture, and the protection only goes to the extent of the forfeiture. There is but one safe course, and that is to adopt the substitute or some similar measure. Will not the company get all the lands it is entitled to under the substitute, if that be adopted? The settlers will be protected as far as they can be protected by legislative enactment, but if they can be protected further, in God's name let us protect them.

No one here will go further in any effort to protect them than I will. I am not willing that this corporation should take shelter under them. Let us not lose sight of the rights of the thousands of homeless families of our country while we are protecting the few settlers who have been duped by this company. I say we should then take back that which belongs to us.

Mr. COBB. If my colleague on the committee will allow me a moment——

Mr. McRAE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COBB. I understand this act does not grant an acre of land within the Indian Territory to this company. I think there is no question of that. I have looked it up very carefully, and that is my conviction. Now, that being so, I take it that the substitute does not cover anything more than the bill does.

Mr. McRAE. Oh, certainly.

Mr. COBB. I assert, as a fair proposition, that the act incorporating the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company does not grant a single acre of that portion of the lands within the Indian Territory.

Mr. McRAE. I think you are correct in that.

Mr. COBB. Because it is not a Territory of the United States, nor is it a State. The Territory never has been regarded in the light of a Territory of the United States.

Mr. McRAE. I think there is no doubt of that.

Mr. COBB. Then practically, as I understand it, the substitute does not cover any more than the original bill, except as to some details you go into with regard to the protection of settlers.

Mr. HOLMAN. And as to the portion completed after 1878.

Mr. McRAE. It affects that.

Mr. COBB. That does not matter. It does not cover an inch of ground more than the bill of the committee.

To explain now: There were only 34 miles of the road completed at the time the whole road should have been running under the act of incorporation. Now, the gentleman from Arkansas proposes to give to this company all of the lands that it has earned, in the language of railroad men, by completing the 34 miles. If they run into the Indian Territory, and no grant being made in that Territory, it can not involve any additional land, and hence it makes no difference as between that provision and the bill of the committee.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let me ask a question. I understand the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands to say that if by any construction there was a grant made in the Indian Territory the present bill forfeits that grant?

Mr. COBB. No, I did not say that; but that there was no grant; because it was beyond the power of Congress to make the grant and it has been so held by the Interior Department as well as by Congress. It has been held that this is not a Territory within the construction of the word as generally employed, but that it is a portion of our territory set apart for a specific purpose; that is to say, for the Indian tribes, and the most of the land in the Territory is owned by the Indians by deeds and treaties. They have titles to it, which are vested in four great tribes of Indians. It is, in other words, an Indian reservation.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But what does the gentleman do with the language of the act itself, which says it shall take effect on the extinguishment of the Indian title?

Mr. COBB. That refers to other small portions of the Indian reservations lying beyond. It was so understood and was never claimed otherwise by the company till a year or two ago.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But in point of fact the company does claim it and has issued mortgages on it?

Mr. COBB. Oh, no.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. They have not done so? I am glad to hear that.

Mr. COBB. They put up a claim five or six years ago and discussed the question before Commissioner Williamson. He decided there was no grant in the Indian Territory, not even a right of way. But they went on, and in order to cover that section of the road treated with the Indians and got the right of way from them under the act of Congress.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That is very important information, which the House will be glad to have.

Mr. COBB. You will find it in the report pretty fully discussed.

Mr. PEEL. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. McRAE] if his substitute forfeits any lands of the grant east of the Indian Territory; in other words, between Springfield and the Indian Territory?

Mr. McRAE. I do not know where the lands are precisely. But the substitute bill seeks to forfeit all the lands where the road has not been constructed within the time fixed by the granting act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this statement in his report in connection with his statement here to-day when he says there is very little difference between the substitute and the bill proposed by the committee. On page 5 of the report he uses this language:

> They are, therefore, both debtor and creditor in this transaction. And they are now only completing such parts of said road as suits their selfish desires, in securing such parts of the land grant as may be conterminous therewith at the date of the declaration of forfeiture by the Government. Since entering into this tripartite agreement they have completed 559 miles of the Western Division.

Now, I think that agreement referred to was entered into after the time fixed by the original granting act had expired; and the gentleman says himself 559 miles of road have been completed and are claimed by these companies since that time. My impression is that the company has reported this amount of road constructed, but in fact some of it was purchased for the purpose of earning this grant.

As I started to say a moment ago, the facts connected with this case call more loudly for a forfeiture than in any case I have been led to examine. This company of themselves have constructed almost nothing. They have taken other roads, bought them, paid little or nothing upon them, given mortgages upon the land grants and the roads so purchased to secure the payments—roads already in operation and constructed with the aid of subsidies from the Government. These are thus made to earn two grants in part.

They are thus extending their lines wherever they want them without any reference to the location provided for the charter of this road, and as the chairman of the committee in his able argument in this report says, they keep up a nominal existence merely so as to enable these two corporations to secure the benefit of the land grant to the extent they desire under the act authorizing the mortgage, and not for a bona fide purpose. There is not a solitary condition of the granting act that was carried out. They did not commence work on, and complete, the first section as the act required, nor within the time specified. They did not complete any of the sections, nor whole road, as was required, nor within the specified time. They have done as nearly nothing of what was required of them as was possible for them to do and claim to have done anything. There is no end to the bonds issued and the mortgages executed by it.

Now, if section 2 of the substitute does not protect the settlers, let some gentleman who will propose something better on this subject. I do not care for the phraseology. I want both the Government and settlers protected, and I appeal to this House to preserve these lands for the generations who are to come after us. Are we not pledged to do so?

My substitute provides for the forfeiture of all the lands not earned within the time, and then for a judicial proceeding which will adjust the difference between the United States and the mortgagees.

While this road in 1871 claimed it did not have the power to mortgage and asked Congress to permit it to do so, there was in fact a mortgage on a part of it executed two years before it discovered that it did not have the power.

There is no question in my mind that the act of April 20, 1871, was surreptitiously passed through Congress with its deceptive title for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage and securing additional hold upon these lands. In construing acts the courts may look to the title in arriving at the intention of the law-making power. If this conviction forces itself upon the mind of Congress, as it appears to have done upon the majority of the Public Lands Committee, these reasons are doubly strong why we should take hold of this matter and settle it at once. Do not let it go to 1922. If the bill proposed by the committee is passed, this adjustment may not be made till the last of these mortgages become due and mortgagees see fit to foreclose. If default should be made, there is no probability of a foreclosure, because the mortgagees make more by refusing to act, and the probability is that they will wait as long as they can.

Mr. COBB. But we forfeit all the lands that are not conterminous with the completed road.

Mr. McRAE. That are not conterminous with the road completed now; that is all they intended to complete for a long time. They are not expecting to complete their road through the desert lands. They say it will not pay them to do so. You give them all they care for at present—the cream of the grant—and yet leave an immense gap uncompleted. I say enter; take back the whole estate granted that it is possible for us to get——

Mr. COBB. We save 28,000,000 of acres.

Mr. McRAE. Yes, of desert lands, and give the company nearly as much of the very best land by the side of these roads that they did not construct at all—roads constructed by aid of other land grants and without this grant. The Government expected a road to be constructed along the line of the thirty-fifth parallel, and did not expect the company to purchase one on the thirty-fifth parallel.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I think that if the provisions of this substitute are understood they will not meet the approval or the conscience of this House. The gentleman suggests that the second section of the substitute is designed to protect settlers in their interests. I see no protection to them in its provisions. Instead of that, it authorizes and directs the representative of the Government to institute proceedings to carry into effect the forfeiture that is declared by the bill. What will be the effect? I do not care, for the purposes of this discussion, whether these mortgagees have a valid mortgage or not, whether it can be sustained and maintained in court or not; but it is of importance to this House, and of importance to thousands of people in Southwest Missouri, whether this substitute shall be adopted and enacted into law or not. This road was constructed to the western boundary of Missouri years ago, and has been constructed 34 miles into the Indian Territory. Along the line of the road the lands have been sold; the company has parted with its title, and settlers have purchased and occupy the lands.

Mr. McRAE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. McRAE. Was not this part of the road which you refer to constructed within the prescribed time?

Mr. PERKINS. But your substitute, if I understand its provisions, proposes to forfeit the entire grant of this railroad company.

Mr. McRAE. Oh, no. You do not understand it. It proposes only to forfeit that part of the grant where the road was not constructed within the time prescribed.

Mr. PERKINS. I think it is well, Mr. Speaker, that there should be no uncertainty or ambiguity. As I was suggesting, the lands along the line of this road in Southwestern Missouri have passed into the possession of settlers; homes are there; the people have occupied and cultivated the lands for years; they have invested their money and have rested, as they supposed, in perfect security in the titles they possess. Now, as I understand the provisions of this substitute, all that is to be disturbed, and the representative of the Government is authorized to institute actions in court to adjust the titles. What would be the effect of that? It would precipitate contests upon these settlers. The settler would be compelled to go to the local land offices for the purpose of securing a title from the Government—a title which he now has, unless it is disturbed by act of Congress—a title which is satisfactory, and which secures the settlers in their possessions. But declare an entire forfeiture of these lands and impose upon these people the necessity of going into local tribunals or local land offices to secure new titles, and you impose upon them a hardship indeed.

Others may come in and institute contests with them; others may move upon the same lands that are now occupied and thus precipitate contests about titles which will send the settlers from the local land offices to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and thence to the Secretary of the Interior—contests attended with costs, attended with delay, attended with uncertainty, attended with hardships, for which, in my judgment, there is no occasion or justification. If this railroad company has an unearned grant of land, let us forfeit it and restore it to the Government; but let us act in moderation and deal in justice with existing rights. While taking from the company lands not earned, do not let us take from the people the homes they possess and for years have beautified with their industry and toil. In our zeal to strike a land-grant railroad company, do not let us, without cause or justification, imperil the homes of all Southwestern Missouri.

The people are not asking that the title to the lands originally granted to this company and parted with by the company to settlers shall be disturbed; but, if I understand the scope of this substitute, it would disturb those titles as well as others.

Now, as to the effect of this bill on the lands in the Indian Territory, as suggested by the chairman of the committee, it is questionable whether the company has any grant there or not. Those are not public lands; they are not open to settlement; people are not authorized to go in and settle upon those lands or to make homes there; the company has made no disposition of them, except as they may be affected by the mortgage which has been executed, the provisions of which have been discussed. But so far as the road has been constructed, so far as the lands have passed from the Government to the company along the finished and completed line, it seems to me there ought not to be any disposition on the part of this House to declare a forfeiture and to put in jeopardy the homes of the people.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with my colleague on the committee [Mr. McRAE] so far as his amendment is concerned, but I am very well satisfied, as a legal proposition, that under the act of 1871 to which he has referred we can not forfeit the lands that are conterminous with the completed road; in other words, that the mortgages have a subsisting lien for the moneys that they have advanced upon the mortgage, a lien which must be satisfied before anything can come to the Government from a forfeiture; and when that lien is satisfied I do not believe there would be anything left. So that this question is, perhaps, more a question of principle than a practical question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to my colleague, I think this bill ought to pass as the committee have reported it. It is the same bill that passed here two years ago. It was fully considered then by the House; the committee have given it careful consideration now; the majority of the committee favor the bill in this form, and I think it ought to pass. I do not think any objection ought to be raised against the bill as reported by the committee. I do not wish to take up the time of the House. If any gentleman desires to ask any questions in regard to the provisions of the bill, I shall take pleasure in answering them if I can; but if there is no such desire, I shall move the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman [Mr. COBB] allow me three minutes to say a few words in reference to the third section of this substitute?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed especially to the third section of this substitute, which provides that the Attorney-General is "authorized and directed to institute proper legal proceedings to set aside and cancel any mortgage or mortgages that may have been executed by said company upon the lands forfeited by this act." If any mortgages have been executed by the railroad company which cover the lands forfeited by this act, those mortgages cover other lands as well as those forfeited; they cover the road-bed, the depots, and the rolling-stock of the railroad company. Now, what would be the effect of a proceeding by the Attorney-General to bring a mortgagee into court and have his mortgage canceled when a part of that mortgage was good and a part bad? I do not see that we ought to require such a proceeding to be brought in the courts. The courts can not decide the question properly. If the railroad companies think they have mortgages upon these lands, let them at their own expense proceed in the courts to foreclose their mortgates and see whether they can perfect their title.

Mr. McRAE. It is not their interest to foreclose, because the longer they wait the more they get.

Mr. SPRINGER. If they do not go into court and foreclose their mortgages, I do not see that the Attorney-General should go into court to have a portion of the mortgage declared invalid.

Mr. RANNEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. RANNEY. The principal of the mortgage not being due and the interest being regularly paid, how can the mortgage be foreclosed until it expires?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no desire to facilitate or hurry up these foreclosure proceedings. If the Government of the United States has declared the lands forfeited and has given deeds for them to its citizens, who have gone on the lands and perfected their title, I want their title to stand in the courts as against any mortgage the railroad company may have upon these lands. I think the patents to the settlers will stand good for their protection.

Mr. RANNEY. I understand that the mortgage of 1871 was given under express authority granted by Congress. This being so, I wish to know whether we can disturb that vested right on the assumption, as one gentleman has stated, that the act was procured from Congress by fraud.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will propound that question to the Committee on Public Lands, they will answer that they have considered it and in consequence of their decision have reported this bill to forfeit the lands to the United States. The judgment of the Committee on Public Lands in this House, as expressed in their report and in this proposition to forfeit those lands, is that the Government can withdraw any title that it may have given, if it ever did give any.

Mr. RANNEY. The gentleman being a good lawyer, and it appearing that the mortgage was given under the authority of a special act of Congress, I wanted to know his opinion, as I esteem it valuable, whether Congress can now destroy that vested right.

Mr. SPRINGER. The question of vested rights has been settled by the reports of the Committee on Public Lands upon this subject.

Mr. RANNEY. I do not agree to that.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman does not agree with the committee, then of course he will vote against this bill. But I have not been impressed with the argument which claims for these vast railroad corporations vested rights to the public domain. I think the people have some vested rights; and their representatives are here now to assert those vested rights, and to claim this public domain for actual settlers.

Mr. RANNEY. But third parties have an interest in the lands.

Mr. COBB. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that the people have vested rights; and I think in some cases corporations also have such rights. In this case I believe they have rights under the law which the gentleman had not perhaps looked into. Now, here is the law passed in 1871. I think it very likely its passage through this House may have been secured in the manner stated by my colleague on the committee. That act, however, had a purpose, and that purpose has been accomplished, and we can not gainsay it. Let me read a provision of that act. After reciting some of the facts and giving the power to mortgage this land grant, together with the road-bed, &c., of the company, the act continues:

Provided, That if the company shall hereafter suffer any breach of the conditions of the act above referred to, under which it is organized, the rights of those claiming under any mortgage made by the company to the lands granted to it by said act shall extend only to so much thereof as shall be conterminous with or appertaining to that part of said road which shall have been constructed at the time of the foreclosure of said mortgage.

Now, I submit, taking the whole legislation together, the true construction of this language is "at the time of forfeiture;" otherwise, as my colleague on the committee has said, the grant under this provision might stand for a hundred years if foreclosure should not be made. Taking the whole legislation together—the original act in connection with this act of 1871, a portion of which I have read—I think there is clearly reserved to the Government of the United States a right to forfeit these lands, but only such lands as lie non-conterminous with the completed road. This is, I think, the true construction; and it was the construction of the majority of the committee. If this be the correct construction, our act of forfeiture can not go further. I would be glad to forfeit all these lands if we had the power to do so.

This company has all the way along made breaches of the conditions upon which the grant was made. It will never complete this road. I am satisfied beyond all doubt that to-day the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company owns none of this road from beginning to end, but it is all owned by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company and the Saint Louis and San Francisco Company. All of this road that they ever intend to complete has been completed, and I would be glad to forfeit every inch of the lands granted if I believed that in legal contemplation it could be done. But my opinion is that we have not the legal power to carry our forfeiture so far; that all we can do is to take the lands non-conterminous with the completed road. This the bill proposes to do. The substitute proposes in terms to go somewhat further; but practically I do not think it does so, because, as I have said, no grant of lands in the Indian Territory was ever made to this railroad corporation. In view of the construction heretofore adopted by the courts as to the Indian Territory, I think the third section of the act is very clear. It says:

That there be, and hereby is, granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific coast, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores over the route of said line of railway and its branches, every alternate section of public land," &c.

Now the Indian Territory is not construed to be "public land," and never was so considered either by the Interior Department or the courts. The Interior Department, as I have already said, has decided in an able opinion that not an inch of the lands lying within the limits of the Indian Territory was granted by this act, because such lands are not embraced in any organized Territory of the United States or in any State.

Mr. SPRINGER. My friend from Indiana [Mr. COBB] will allow me to say that the title of the Cherokee Nation is a title in fee-simple by the express terms of the act of Congress which gave it to them, and by the act such title is to remain in that nation so long as that Indian tribe shall occupy the land or until the tribe shall become extinct. Under these conditions the duration of the grant is likely to be indefinite.

Mr. COBB. They have power under this act to make contracts with the Indians subject to the control of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior. In pursuance of that act they did make some sort of agreement with the chiefs of the four nations through whose lands this road passes in reference to the right of way, thereby admitting they had no title to these lands, and that on the contrary the lands were owned by these four nations of Indians. Those Indian nations, as they are called, own these lands in the Indian Territory by absolute treaty, which even the Congress of the United States could not, if it would, violate. If, therefore, the Congress of the United States made this grant with the intention of giving these lands in the Indian Territory to this road it could not do so, because the United States did not own the lands at the time of the grant. Some of the lands, it is true, in the Indian Territory, are not thus owned under treaty stipulations by the Indians, but the greater portion are set apart by Congress for a specific purpose, and they are not regarded as any portion of the public lands of the United States. Nor are these lands regarded as territory in the meaning of the law. So the courts of the United States and so the Department of the Interior have decided time and again.

I now demand the previous question on the substitute and ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MCRAE's substitute was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of asking a question. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] either offered or gave notice he would offer an amendment that would cover the troublesome law question as to the rights of the bondholders under the peculiar language of the amended act.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided the amendment was not then in order under the rules of the House, there being at that time several amendments proposed by the committee and an amendment to one of those amendments offered by the gentleman from Indiana. The gentleman from Alabama did not at a subsequent stage reoffer his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. My understanding was that the gentleman's amendment applied to the substitute.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I understood it was intended to apply to the original bill.

Mr. COBB. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I understood the gentleman from Alabama directed his remarks to the substitute of the gentleman from Arkansas. I do not think he intended to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I may probably be mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama at the close of his remarks proposed to offer an amendment, which the Chair decided not to be in order. Thereupon the gentleman himself read the amendment for the information of the House. It was never pending.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Has the Clerk possession of the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided the amendment was not in order, and it was not afterward renewed.

The bill was passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that he had approved and signed, February 20, an act (H. R. 989) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

SATURDAY SESSIONS FOR DEBATE ONLY.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask by unanimous consent that Saturday of each week until further order of the House be set apart for debate only, no business to be done.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRISON (at 3 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

Coggeshall, president of the Polk County Woman's Suffrage Association, and 15 other citizens, of Des Moines, Iowa, and the petition of Mrs. Mary Wetherall, president of the Marion County (Iowa) Woman's Suffrage Association, and other citizens, of Knoxville, Iowa, praying for the passage of a joint resolution at the present session of Congress submitting to the several State Legislatures a proposition to so amend the national Constitution as to protect the women of all the States and Territories in the enjoyment of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of J. H. Cornish & Co. and other citizens of Osage, Iowa, praying for the enactment of a law requiring all imitations of butter and cheese manufactured or sold in the United States or used on the table of public eating-houses to be labeled with a United States stamp; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOLPH. I present a preamble and resolutions adopted by the Walla Walla Board, of Trade of Washington Territory, protesting against the forfeiture of the land grant to aid in the construction of the Cascade Branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad. It is not lengthy, and as it relates to a very important matter, I desire to have it appear in the RECORD.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Preamble and resolutions against the forfeiture of the land grant to aid in construction of the Cascade Branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Whereas that portion of the United States known as Eastern Washington and Northern Idaho and Northeastern Oregon, and which is locally called the Inland Empire, contains about 100,000 inhabitants whose chief occupation is the production of wheat;

Whereas during the present harvest year there was produced in this Inland Empire over 400,000 tons, or over 12,000,000 bushels of wheat, of which over 10,000,000 bushels were for export;

Whereas nine-tenths of the surplus product of this Inland Empire is compelled to seek market over the railroad constructed and operated by the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company on the south side of the Columbia River, which company charges $6 a ton, or 18 cents a bushel, for transporting wheat from Walla Walla to Portland, a distance of 245 miles;

Whereas the Columbia River, by reason of great natural obstructions to navigation at the Cascades and The Dalles, is not now an available route to market;

Whereas the Northern Pacific Railroad Company has constructed all but 75 miles of the mountain portion of a railroad between Pasco, a point on its main line in Eastern Washington within 20 miles of the Oregon State line, over the Cascade Mountains to Tacoma, on Puget Sound, has let the contract for building a tunnel nearly 2 miles long on this Cascade division, and is prosecuting the work of completing this road, which will give the producers and other inhabitants of the Inland Empire the benefits which flow from competing railroads and markets;

Whereas Congress agreed to give the Northern Pacific Railroad Company a specified amount of land for each mile of railroad built by it between Lake Superior and Puget Sound;

Whereas that corporation has constructed all but 75 miles of the great transcontinental line it undertook to build, and has operated the constructed portion in the interest of the people, as is evinced by its charging only $8 per ton, or 24 cents per bushel, for transporting wheat from Wallula Junction to Saint Paul, a distance of 1,698 miles, through what a few years ago was a wilderness, thus making it possible for producers within reach of its road to obtain 8 cents more per bushel for their wheat than it is possible for producers dependent on the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company to obtain; and

Whereas we believe that the material prosperity of the Inland Empire, particularly of Eastern Washington and Northern Idaho, will be greatly advanced by the speedy completion of the Cascade Branch of the Northern Pacific; and

Whereas we believe that the completion of the Cascade Branch of the Northern Pacific, a road we consider absolutely necessary for our future prosperity, would be hindered and delayed by a forfeiture of the land grant to the company: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Walla Walla Board of Trade implores Congress not to forfeit the grant for the Cascade Branch and to confirm the title of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to the land along the completed portions of its road.

Resolved, That Hon. CHARLES S. VOORHEES, Delegate to Congress from Washington Territory, and the Senators and Representatives from Oregon be, and they are hereby, requested to exert their influence to prevent the forfeiture of the land grant for the Cascade Branch of the Northern Pacific.

Resolved, That the president and secretary forward authenticated copies of this preamble and resolutions to Delegate VOORHEES, the Oregon delegation, the President of the Senate, and Speaker of the House.

Passed the Walla Walla Board of Trade February 12, 1886.

H. P. ISAACS, President.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a petition of Post No. 51, Grand Army of the Republic, of Raymond, Rock County, New Hampshire. The petitioners "earnestly but respectfully pray your honorable body to pass at the earliest practicable day a bill embodying the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic as set forth in its recent communication to your honorable body. We ask you to pass it from the consideration of the following facts, which we believe to be true: First, because the private soldier of the United States Army is the peer of this world; second, they are the mainstay of the Government; third, they only ask the true principles carried out, or Democracy, or Democrat, or Republican, or honesty, or equal justice; fourth, they have made all the people of the United States of America; fifth, they have made all the Congresses of the United States of America; sixth, they made all the Presidents and all other officers of the United States of America; seventh, and they let their enemies live; wherefore we ask, desire, and pray your honorable body to pass it, and that they have their highest generalship title, and the highest rate of general pension paid them by the Congress of the United States of America."

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a petition, signed by many reputable householders in this city, residing in the immediate neighborhood of the operating machinery and engines of the United States Electric Lighting Company, complaining of the injury to health and property by the nuisance created by that machinery, which the petitioners believe to have been located there without permission of law. They ask for legislation that will relieve them from the injuries under which they suffer. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I present the petition of a committee appointed by a convention held on the 4th of November, 1885, at Darien, Ga., relating to the improvement of the Altamaha River and its branches. As the petition is of some length I desire to refer in a condensed form to the points made in it.

The petitioners state that the water ways to be improved run through and are used by twenty-two of the counties of the State. The great Altamaha River, and the Ocmulgee, the Oconee, the Ohoopee, which are navigable branches of the river, are the water way really for twenty-two counties in the State. At a good stage of water the Ocmulgee is navigable for 250 miles, the Oconee, taking in its windings, for about 225 miles, and the Ohoopee for nearly the same distance, making over 600 miles that by proper improvement would be made navigable, counting the Ocmulgee and its branches.

There are some shoals and sand-bars that at stages of low water interfere with and even stop the navigation. The petitioners want a survey of the entrance of the harbor at Doboy Sound, so that it may be improved and cleared out until it will accommodate the commerce of the rivers already mentioned. They hope to get 17 feet of water at the bar without a very heavy appropriation. They say there are 100,000,000 feet of lumber shipped annually from the port, 200,000 bushels of rice, besides considerable quantities of wool, naval stores, cotton, and other farm products. The tonnage engaged in the carrying trade is 100,000 tons. From Lumber City, a town upon the river, the shipments of cotton and other products amount to 20,000 tons annually, besides large amounts shipped from Hawkinsville on the Ocmulgee and Dublin on the Oconee. There are vast forests of pine timber up along the rivers, and vessels from almost every port in the civilized world come there to get timber for masts and spars. There are thirty-eight mills in constant operation sawing timber along the line of the rivers, the rivers being the only means of transportation for nearly all of them.

There were fifty-eight turpentine distilleries at the beginning of the present year in full operation along the line of the Altamaha and its tributaries. Cotton, fruits, root-plants, &c., grow in great abundance. The great want is transportation. There is a swamp from a mile to a mile and a quarter wide along a great portion of the river, that abounds in the hard woods of various kinds that are very valuable, and the petitioners believe that the proper cleaning out of the river would drain a large portion of it as an incident to the improvement.

Their estimates show that there are $75,000,000 worth of naval stores and timber in easy reach of the Altamaha, $60,000,000 in reach of the Ocmulgee, and $50,000,000 in reach of the Oconee, and a large number adjacent to the Ohoopee River, it being one of the finest forests probably on any continent or in any country.

The prayer of the petitioners is for the general improvement of the river by the Government. The petition represents 200,000 people occupying 13,000 square miles of territory, who are in a great measure dependent upon the Altamaha for transportation.

I present the petition and commend its objects to the attention of the Senate. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 453) to forfeit the lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask that it be printed and laid upon the table in order that I may call it up for action to-morrow.

The joint resolution (S. R. 49) authorizing the loan of obsolete or practically useless instruments of the Coast and Geodetic Survey to colleges, &c., was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACT FOR 1885.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 15,000 additional copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1885; of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

SAINT LOUIS AND SAN FRANCISCO RAILWAY.

Mr. VAN WYCK. On the 18th instant I entered a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate passed the bill (S. 91) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant a right of way for a railroad and telegraph line through the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians to the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, and for other purposes." I now ask the consent of the Senate to withdraw that motion. I suppose the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] who had the measure specially in charge and whose section of country the bill will reach understood my motive in entering the motion to reconsider at that time. I felt that it might possibly be unjust if any new principle were introduced by the Senate on any bill that was then or hereafter might be under consideration that should not be applied to that bill which had already passed the Senate; but upon an examination of the matter I find that the bill was in the shape, as stated by the Senator from Texas, in which the original measure was passed some four years ago, after due consideration and deliberation; and the bill when reached in the Senate for action a few days ago was simply to extend the time for the completion of the road. The Senator from Texas feels that it would be unjust to that road to hold it in suspense at this time, and I have come to the same conclusion and ask the consent of the Senate to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the motion to reconsider is withdrawn; and the bill stands passed.

PEARSON C. MONTGOMERY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar is now in order. The first case on the Calendar will be announced.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

L. MADISON DAY.

The bill (S. 266) for the relief of L. Madison Day was announced as the next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] not being present, I suggest that that bill go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

PUBLIC LAND LAWS.

The bill (S. 1296) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. That can hardly be considered in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over to the Calendar under Rule IX.

WILBUR F. STEELE.

The bill (S. 1223) for the relief of Wilbur F. Steele was next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

ARKANSAS HOT SPRINGS.

The next business on the Calendar was the concurrent resolution reported by Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, February 1, 1886, relative to bath-house and hot-water privileges on the Government lands at Hot Springs, Ark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read at length.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read. There is no report accompanying it.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

Mr. BERRY. I move to consider it, notwithstanding the objection. I see no reason why it should not be considered now and finally disposed of. It is a unanimous report from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I know the motion is not debatable, but my colleague [Mr. PLUMB], the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, is unavoidably absent to-day, and I know that he desires to be present when the discussion occurs.

Mr. BERRY. Very well. With that understanding I have no objection to the resolution going over without prejudice. The Senator's colleague united in making the report; it was a unanimous report from the committee; but if the Senator from Kansas who is absent desires to be present when the resolution is considered, I consent to its going over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over without prejudice.

STATUES TO COLUMBUS, LAFAYETTE, AND GARFIELD.

The joint resolution (S. R. 35) setting apart public reservations for statues to Columbus, Lafayette, and James A. Garfield was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] who reported that bill desires to be present when it is considered. Let it go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will go over without prejudice.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The joint resolution (S. R. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women was next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BLAIR. Let it be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the joint resolution will go over.

Mr. BLAIR. Without prejudice?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over to the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator from New Hampshire suppose that that measure can be properly considered during the morning hour on any day?

Mr. BLAIR. Very likely not.

Mr. INGALLS. Then why not let it take its place under Rule IX? It can be called up by a majority at any time they desire.

Mr. BLAIR. There is, I suppose, really no objection to that disposition of it, but I should like to say at this time——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under Rule IX.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to say that the friends of the measure desire to call it up for consideration as early as may be, and to have a vote upon it, and have it settled.

ALBERT H. EMERY.

The bill (S. 929) for the relief of Albert H. Emery was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was read in full on a previous day.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think that bill can be considered under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

Mr. HOAR. That bill has passed the Senate two or three times. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee to let the report be read. I think a five-minute discussion under Rule VIII will probably answer the purpose.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill involves some tolerably important questions and a large amount. I have no desire to debate it, and I have no disposition, if the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to proceed with it, to postpone its consideration; but I doubt very much whether we ought to undertake to consider a bill such as that under the five-minute rule. I shall not object, though, with a view of carrying it over.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator made, I think, a favorable report himself once upon the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. To a given extent the Senator from Massachusetts is right. I thought that there was an allowance which ought to be made, but one very much less, my recollection is, than the amount now reported or the amount claimed. That is my recollection of the history of the case.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], whose constituent I think Mr. Emery now is, is quite well informed about the bill. Though I am entirely prepared to discuss it myself, I would suggest that it go over till to-morrow without prejudice, as the Senator from Connecticut is not in his seat now, and then the Senator from Tennessee can determine whether he would like to have it taken out of this Calendar or not.

Mr. HARRIS. I am satisfied to take that course. Let the bill go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

FRANCES E. STEWART.

The bill (S. 257) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased, was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and was read by the Chief Clerk.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill just read was reported favorably at the last Congress. It had been several times reported favorably from the Senate Committee on Claims, and I think it passed the Senate at the last Congress. A bill for the relief of the same party, and the same bill substantially, appropriating the same amount, has passed the House at the present session of Congress, has been reported favorably by the Committee on Claims, and it is Order of Business 182. I move, therefore, to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves to substitute the House bill in the place of the Senate bill, and to take its place on the Calendar. If there be no objection that course will be pursued.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the Senator ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the House bill. It will not do to substitute it, because it would then be an amendment of the Senate bill, and would have to go back to the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that, and treats the request as simply to substitute the House bill to this place on the Calendar, not a substitute by way of amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Ah!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the House bill will be taken up.

The bill (H. R. 3829) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased, $3,160.50, in full of all balances due the estate of Michael S. Stewart, deceased, growing out of a contract made on or about the 10th of December, 1864, between Michael S. Stewart and Capt. George B. Hibbard, then assistant quartermaster at Nashville, Tenn., by which Stewart agreed to cut and deliver 10,000 cords of wood at the Cumberland River for the use of the Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 257, of a corresponding character, will be indefinitely postponed.

THOMAS MILLER.

The bill (S. 23) giving a military record to Thomas Miller was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It requires the Secretary of War to enter on the rolls of Company M, Eighth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, the name of Thomas Miller, as duly mustered into the United States service on the 27th day of August, 1863, and to complete his military record as follows: "Killed by the enemy November 25, 1863, while in the line of duty."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

The bill (S. 1302) authorizing the appointment of an assistant secretary of the Navy, and fixing the salary of the same, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HALE. I ask that that may for to-day retain its place and be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, if there be no objection, retaining its place on the Calendar.

MILITARY INSTRUCTORS FOR COREA.

The joint resolution (S. R. 28) authorizing the President of the United States to grant permission to one or more officers of the Army to accept temporary service under the Government of Corea, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to grant permission to one or more officers of the United States Army to accept positions under the Government of Corea to instruct and drill its troops, but the officers who may be granted leave under this authority shall not receive any pay or allowances from the United States during their absence from duty with their regiments or corps.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the frame of that be changed so that it will read "a bill" instead of "a joint resolution."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to change the joint resolution so as to convert it into a bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the joint resolution will be changed to a bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SEWELL February 3, 1886:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the following communication from the then President, with the accompanying letter from the Secretary of State of that date, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

The following are the papers referred to as received by the committee from the then President and Secretary of State, and which the committee beg to make a part of their report:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit a communication from the Secretary of State in regard to the desire of the Government of Corea to obtain the services of one or more officers of the United States as military instructors in that country, and recommend the adoption of a joint resolution authorizing such officers as may be conveniently spared, and who may be selected for that duty, to proceed to Corea for the purpose indicated.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 30, 1885.

To the President:

It appears from a dispatch addressed to this Department by Mr. Lucius H. Foote, the accredited diplomatic representative of this Government to that of Corea, and which was received shortly after his arrival at Seoul, that the Government of Corea was extremely anxious to procure the services of an American military officer to instruct and drill its troops.

In dispatches of September 3 and 17 last, Mr. Foote again recurs to this subject, and urges the importance of our acceding to the request of His Majesty's Government as a means of strengthening our influence in that peninsular kingdom. "All expenses in coming," says Mr. Foote, "will be paid, and a fair salary, commensurate with the importance of the position, will be paid."

The subject was accordingly submitted to the Secretary of War for his consideration, with a request that if it were possible to meet the wishes of the Corean Government in the premises, the step was thought to be a wise one, and would result beneficially to the United States in many ways.

Mr. Lincoln's reply of the 24th ultimo stated that it was not unlikely that one or more competent officers could be selected for such a duty, although their absence would entail additional duties upon others, there being no provision in regard to officers of the line of the Army for replacing those absent from their proper stations; "but," observes Mr. Lincoln, "I have the honor to invite your attention to the last paragraph of section 9 of the first article of the Constitution, which provides that 'no person holding any office of profit or trust under them [the United States] shall, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state.'"

Mr. Lincoln then alludes to the request of the Corean Government, which embraced not only the holding of an office under that government, but the giving by it of some emolument to the officer, and adds that, indeed, if it were otherwise it would probably be difficult to find an officer who would be willing to undertake the duty. But before any such officer could be sent the necessary authorization of Congress must be obtained.

I therefore suggested to Mr. Lincoln, in a letter of the 12th instant, the propriety of his making the required application; but at his instance I have thus brought the matter to your attention, and do recommend that Congress be requested to grant the necessary permission to one or more officers of the United States Army to proceed to Corea and take temporary service under the government of that country as herein indicated.

I am persuaded that such a step will be especially gratifying to that government and increase the friendly feeling toward the United States which animates the Government of Corea.

Respectfully submitted.

FRED'K T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 29, 1885.

For the reasons set forth by the Secretary of State, the committee report the accompanying joint resolution, authorizing the President to grant permission to one or more officers of the Army to accept temporary service under the Government of Corea, for the purposes indicated in the foregoing communication of the honorable Secretary, and recommend the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to amend by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That no leave of absence granted to any officer under the authority of this act shall extend for over three years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Has the Senator from New Jersey considered whether under the Constitution these detached officers would be permitted to receive any compensation from the Government of Corea without the consent of Congress.

Mr. SEWELL. There are precedents for this. We have sent officers to some of the South American states.

The bill (S. 1634) authorizing the President of the United States to grant permission to one or more officers of the Army to accept temporary service under the Government of Corea was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. INGALLS. I am inclined to think this bill ought to be amended. The provision of the Constitution is very clear:

No person holding any office of profit or trust under them—

The United States—

shall, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state.

It is obvious that under the provision of the Constitution these officers who are detached can not, without violating their oaths of office, accept any compensation for this duty that they are authorized and expected to perform. I would suggest that the Senator from New Jersey prepare an amendment that will permit them to receive compensation for the service rendered to the Government of Corea, and that meanwhile the bill be passed over temporarily for that purpose, and the next bill considered. It can be done in a very few moments.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over for the present, and the vote ordering it to a third reading will be reconsidered.

Mr. INGALLS. It can all be done by unanimous consent.

PLANTS AND SHRUBS FOR PENSION BUILDING.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 71) authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension Building was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. What was done with Order of Business 130, being the resolution reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] from the Committee on Foreign Relations in relation to fishing rights?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been made a special order.

Mr. HALE. What became of Order of Business 130?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed it is already a special order. It is at the head of the Calendar as a special order, but the time for which it was assigned as a special order has passed by.

Mr. HALE. It does not lose its place?

Mr. COCKRELL. It was made a special order, but retained its place on the Calendar. It is only a question of how we shall conduct the business.

Mr. HALE. My colleague being absent, I desire it to retain its place and to be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It retains its place, but having been made a special order, it is not read on this call of the Calendar. It will remain in the position it is now.

Mr. COCKRELL. It seems to me that would probably be the correct way.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 71) authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension Building was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INCREASE OF CAPITAL AND CHANGE OF LOCATION, NATIONAL BANKS.

Senate bill No. 1365 was announced as next in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent now to take up Order of Business 228, being the bill (H. R. 327) to enable national banking associations to increase their capital stock and to change their names or locations. If this bill can have consideration it will save the necessity of considering several private bills both of the House and the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BECK. I should like to hear the first section read again.

The Chief Clerk read the first section of the bill, as follows:

That any national banking association may, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, by the vote of shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of the association, increase its capital stock, in accordance with existing laws, to any sum approved by the said Comptroller, notwithstanding the limit fixed in its original articles of association and determined by said Comptroller; and no increase of the capital stock of any national banking association, either within or beyond the limit fixed in its original articles of association, shall be made except in the manner herein provided.

Mr. BECK. I thought that was to be done with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I was not aware that the House bill contained a provision for the Comptroller of the Currency surpervising the matter. I think it ought to be so amended as to require the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORRILL. That amendment was made to one bill that we passed—a private bill.

Mr. BECK. I think it would be well to make the general bill subject to that approval.

Mr. MORRILL. I think it was the general opinion of the Committee on Finance that that amendment should be made in a bill that was reported for a single bank.

Mr. HOAR. The Comptroller of the Currency is left with the very much more important power of approving the fixing of the capital stock, approving, I think, the reduction of the capital stock in certain cases. Why should he not have this much less important power of approving a change of name and location?

Mr. BECK. The head of the Department is the Secretary of the Treasury. He, of course, would not act without consultation with the Comptroller of the Currency. We generally prefer to deal with the head of a Department rather than the head of one of its bureaus.

Mr. INGALLS. The first section, if I understood it correctly, refers to the increase of capital stock.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Vermont, does not the present law give the Comptroller of the Currency the control when a bank is originally established of the question of the validity of all its proceedings; and then if the capital stock is subsequently increased or diminished by the vote of the stockholders, is not the Comptroller of the Currency the officer who deals with all these questions? The matter has come up hastily.

Mr. ALLISON. Under existing law a national bank has absolute authority to reduce its circulation and its capital stock without the intervention of the Comptroller of the Currency; but the Comptroller of the Currency under existing law can not authorize the increase of the capital stock. We have in special cases increased the capital stock by special law.

Mr. INGALLS. The language of this bill would seem to imply that the determination was originally with the Comptroller, the language being:

> Notwithstanding the limit fixed in its original articles of association and determined by said Comptroller.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. A national bank seeking to organize fixes its own capital, and when the Comptroller of the Currency authorizes the establishment of that bank that fixes the capital.

Mr. HOAR. But when they reduce, if they propose to reduce afterward, unless I am mistaken they have got to get the approbation of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. ALLISON. The law of 1874 covers that case; and my recollection is that a national bank can reduce its capital. I know it can reduce its circulation without the consent of Congress.

Mr. HOAR. The reduction of capital has to have the consent of the Comptroller and of the Secretary. It seems to me all these discretions should be in one officer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls attention to the fact that if this amendment is made, it should be made in several sections.

Mr. ALLISON. It should run through the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. This modification can not be made intelligently in this way; and if the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky is to prevail the bill should have more careful consideration than can be given to it now.

Mr. HARRISON. It seems to me that the second section of this bill confers a very extraordinary power. It authorizes a change of location without any limitation—a change of location from one State to another, from one city to another, upon a vote of two-thirds of the capital stock. It seems to me that that power ought not to be vested in any proportion of the stock. A stockholder who has become associated in a banking institution located at Indianapolis ought not to have the institution with which he is connected as a stockholder transferred to New York without unanimous consent. It seems to me also that it introduces some complications as to the rights and liabilities of those who are dealing with a bank in a given location where their notes mature and may be protested, a question whether it carries the place of payment of those obligations to the bank to another location. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance; it seems to me that it is a very broad and rather unwise power to confer.

Mr. HOAR. I find on looking at the Revised Statutes that I was right in my recollection unless the law has been changed since the statutes were revised. Section 5142 provides that—

> Any association formed under this title may, by its articles of association, provide for an increase of its capital from time to time.

Then—

> No increase of capital shall be valid until the whole amount of such increase is paid in, and notice thereof has been transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency and his certificate obtained specifying the amount of such increase of capital stock, with his approval thereof.

Then section 5143 provides for a reduction of the capital stock by a vote of two-thirds of the shareholders, but no such reduction shall be made "until the amount of the proposed reduction has been reported to the Comptroller of the Currency and his approval thereof obtained."

It seems to me that if the Comptroller is to supervise the original formation of the association and give his assent to its going into operation, and if he has the control of the increase or reduction of capital stock, all these smaller, less important, matters connected with the banking business should be under the same jurisdiction. You have now one officer supervising the bank for one purpose, and another for another.

Mr. SHERMAN (Mr. BLAIR in the chair). Mr. President, I think that the Senator from Kentucky is mistaken about the necessity of amending this bill by transferring the power conferred by it to the Secretary of the Treasury, and perhaps he will on reflection see that there are reasons why it should not be done.

In the first place, the banking law has conferred very large and extensive powers on the Comptroller of the Currency as distinguished from the Secretary of the Treasury. The Comptroller of the Currency is under the most rigid responsibility. He holds a peculiar office, is bound to give bond; and in many cases he exercises large powers. Then, besides, he can not be interested in a national bank; he can not by possibility under the law have any interest which would affect his mind in dealing with any bank. He can not hold a share of bank stock. The law is framed on the idea that the Comptroller of the Currency should do all the executive duties and perform all acts connected with the Government's relation to the banks except a very few that are necessarily conferred upon the head of the Department.

There are certain greater questions that are left to the Secretary of the Treasury as the head of the Department; for instance the power of appointment, also the amount of the currency and the like; but all subordinate powers in regard to the management of the banks are left with the Comptroller of the Currency, and they ought to be so left. We ought always to have a man in that office equal to the powers to be performed by that office, and it seems to me now that to turn over these powers to the Secretary of the Treasury might create embarrassment. For instance the Secretary of the Treasury is not a bonded officer; he may be the owner of bank stock; he may be interested in the management of banks; and therefore he ought not to be trusted with these powers. They were purposely given to an officer who is separated from all possibility of interest in order that he might be armed with very large and extensive powers.

I think the bill is defective in one or two particulars, because it does not limit the bounds within which a removal may be made. According to the broad language of the bill, a bank may be removed, as my friend from Indiana suggested, from Indianapolis to New York or from New York to San Francisco. That is not the purpose of the bill, and no Comptroller probably would authorize such a removal. Therefore it may be said that I am creating a fanciful danger where there is no real danger. That may be true; but still the law itself ought to contain some boundaries upon the limits of the discretion of the Comptroller. The removal ought not to be beyond the limits of the State very clearly, and perhaps it ought not to be beyond the limits of the county where a bank is located; I do not know but that would be proper. But all the powers conferred ought to be conferred, I think, upon the Comptroller of the Currency, rather than upon the Secretary of the Treasury. That was the view taken by the House of Representatives and I think that is the view with which this bill was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

I believe it would be an inconvenience and a detriment to the public service to have the Secretary of the Treasury always called upon to pass upon the reasons for removing a bank from one town to another town, or for authorizing the increase of a bank's capital stock $100,000 or $50,000. These are matters of detail. They are not matters of very great importance. They are matters that involve no great responsibility, because as banking is free and anybody may start a new bank with any amount of capital, it certainly is no great power simply to give an existing bank the privilege of increasing its stock.

Mr. BECK. I thought until I heard the bill read that the powers conferred by it were vested in the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senate has always thought it best to deal with the heads of the Departments so as to secure accountability and responsibility for whatever may happen in the management of affairs under the control of the Department. While the Comptroller of the Currency has very great powers, and, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] properly suggests, ought to be entirely disinterested in the affairs of national banks, and the law presumes and provides that he is and shall be, I regret to say that in my experience and observation I have not found that to be the fact; therefore I desire that we shall have a Cabinet officer, the head of a great Department, responsible to us, one with whom we can deal directly and who can be held responsible by us for any violation of the trusts reposed in him. I have a case in my mind to which my attention was called the other day which perhaps influences me somewhat in my desire to place this responsibility on the Secretary rather than on the Comptroller of the Currency.

A national bank in Southwestern Kentucky located at Henderson, in one of the large tobacco-producing districts, whose business is mostly with men who ship tobacco to Berlin, London, Paris, and elsewhere in Europe, and consequently deal largely in sterling exchange, had been in the habit for years of transacting its business through the Bank of America in New York. That is a State bank, one of the oldest, strongest, and best in the country. When the report of the bank in Kentucky was made to the Comptroller at the close of last year showing that about $38,000—more than one-tenth of its capital—was in the Bank of America, being the balance received from sterling exchange for proceeds of tobacco which their customers had shipped to foreign countries, the bank was advised by the Comptroller of the Currency in an official letter that it had no right to have that much money or credit for it there because the Bank of America was a State bank. He said that it would have had credit for the amount in its settlement if the Bank of America had been a national bank. He referred to section 5200 of the Revised Statutes in support of that decision, no word of which gives color of authority for such ruling. I will read it:

SEC. 5200. The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including, in the liabilities of a company or firm, the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such association actually paid in. But the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, and the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same, shall not be considered as money borrowed.

It was so plain that those foreign bills of exchange which passed through the Bank of America in payment for tobacco sent to Europe were in no sense a loan and were not money borrowed by the Bank of America, which, by the way, was only a corporation, as national banks are corporations, that I at once presented the case to the Comptroller, and protested against the decision or order issued from his office. He assured me that Mr. Knox had so ruled and Mr. Cannon had always so ruled, and he was bound to follow the precedents. Thus the Bank of America, New York, the Northern Bank of Kentucky, and the best State banks in the country are sought to be ruled out and not to be allowed to transact business on a large scale with the Western banks or Western producers of exports, and have been quietly discriminated against by the Comptroller of the Currency so far as I can see only because he sought to force by his decisions all that important class of business into the national banks. One Comptroller the moment he resigned became the president of a national bank which he had aided in its competition for business with the Bank of America by that character of ruling. Another is to be the vice-president of a national bank, so we are advised, and it is said that he has now left his place in the hands of a deputy for the purpose of taking that position.

When I submitted the question to the Secretary of the Treasury, he at once said, "That ruling is all wrong in my opinion;" and I have received just this moment, since this bill came up, the following from the present acting Comptroller, Mr. Snyder, who, by the way, is a very able young man:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, February 24, 1886.

SIR: Referring to our conversation of yesterday morning, I would say that I have since received a legal opinion which reverses to a certain extent the former ruling of this office as regards section 5200 R. S. I hope you will therefore write to your Henderson friends that their business relations with the Bank of America, New York, will not be disturbed or interfered with by the Comptroller.

Respectfully, yours,

V. P. SNYDER, Deputy Comptroller.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK,
United States Senate, &c.

Up to this time it seems to me that the struggle of the Comptrollers of the Currency has been to drive out of business not only the Bank of America, but to drive out all the great State banks of New York, and the banks of the West as well, such as the Northern Bank of Kentucky at Lexington, the Bank of Louisville, and every other bank that is not a national bank, and force every national bank in the West to have its correspondence and large transactions alone with national banks, in plain violation of law, as I understand it. I do not propose, therefore, if I can help it, to allow that officer to have the authority proposed to be conferred on him by this bill. I propose to lodge it in the responsible head of the Department. All who have occupied that position, as far as I know, have been the advocates, if not the agents, of the national banks while here, and have accepted employment from them as though it was a reward for what they had done while in official position; they certainly enter their service the very moment they quit our employ. If we are going to enlarge the exercise of power in regard to national banks I want it authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, and not by an irresponsible subordinate.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the case the Senator from Kentucky has been discussing is obviously not the case before the Senate, and I think that he himself would admit that it would be very bad policy for the Comptroller of the Currency to allow a national bank to make deposits in all the State banks, many of which are very feeble institutions. It would be altogether too broad to admit of that as a general rule.

I hope that the Senator from Kentucky will allow this bill to pass. I think it can hardly be improved. If an amendment should be made on the second page, in line 3 of section 2, after the words "carried on," by inserting "from one place to another in the same county"—if there is a disposition to adopt such an amendment as that, I see no objection to it. I will move that as an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is in order.

Mr. MORRILL. After the words "carried on," in section 2, line 3, I move to insert "from one place to another in the same county."

Mr. HOAR. I would suggest to the Senator from Vermont whether it would not be better to have that limitation not to depend upon counties. For instance, one of the last cases that happened in my own State (and the Senator himself reported it), was a change from over a county line from one town to an adjoining town. It seems to me that to say "in the same State to any distance within 30 miles," or any limit of distance, would be better than the county.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that instead of the Senator's amendment the following words be inserted:

To any other place within the same State not more than 30 miles distant.

Mr. MORRILL. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. HOAR. Then I move to insert after the words "carried on," in line 3 of section 2, the words:

To any other place within the same State not more than 30 miles distant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as thus modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BECK. Does the first section remain as reported?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first section remains as reported.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out "Comptroller of the Currency" and insert "Secretary of the Treasury."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to strike out, in line 4 of section 1, "Comptroller of the Currency" and insert "Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that will not be done because it will require the bill to be changed throughout from beginning to end.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

The amendment was rejected.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL. Now I move that the bill (S. 1365) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Shakopee, Minn., be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I now ask leave to make a report out of order. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1260) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Minneapolis, Minn., not to exceed $2,000,000, to report it adversely. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY INSTRUCTORS FOR COREA.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senate now to take up the bill which was passed over temporarily for the purpose of amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of the bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1634) authorizing the President of the United States to grant permission to one or more officers of the Army to accept temporary service under the Government of Corea.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to amend by adding to the second section the following:

But may accept such compensation for their services as may be allowed by the Government of Corea.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 453) to forfeit the lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SETTLERS WITHIN NORTHERN KANSAS GRANT.

The bill (S. 333) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

For the purpose of reimbursing persons, and the grantees, heirs, and devisees of persons, who, under the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, settled upon or purchased lands within the grant made by the "act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas Railroad and Telegraph," approved July 23, 1866, and to whom patents have been issued therefor, but against which persons, or their grantees, heirs, or devisees, decrees have been rendered by the United States circuit court on account of the priority of the grant made in the act of July 23, 1866, the bill appropriates $250,000, or so much thereof as shall be required for the said purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1100) to amend the ninth section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HOAR. Let that bill go over without prejudice. My colleague [Mr. DAWES], who is absent, has charge of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HOAR. Let the next four bills on the Calendar, which were reported by my colleague from the Committee on Indian Affairs, also go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 150) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 193) for the relief of John Hollins McBlair; and

A bill (S. 296) for the relief of the legal representatives of John Hatfield, deceased.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the educational bill.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from New Hampshire desires to occupy the time between now and 2 o'clock himself, of course there can be no objection to proceeding to the consideration of the educational bill; but one or two Senators who desire to participate in the debate supposed it would not come up before 2 o'clock and have departed and will not return until that time. I therefore suggest, unless the Senator desires to go on himself, that we proceed with the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. I understood there were gentlemen who would like to speak at 2 o'clock or later. I desired to submit a few observations myself, and thought perhaps I could nearly complete them by that time. I do not wish to interfere with the consideration of the Calendar if gentlemen are anxious to go on with it; but if they are not, I should be glad to proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to point out to the Senator from Kansas that five bills have been passed over on the Calendar in a row in consequence of the absence of my colleague, who I suppose will be here to-morrow; and the next bills all down the same page of the Calendar, with perhaps one exception, are important public bills which will be pretty sure to meet objection to being considered in this way. Therefore we shall probably take up the next twenty minutes by reading their titles and objecting, without anything else. If the Senator from New Hampshire will take up the time by his speech, I think we shall save in the end.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. INGALLS. The understanding being that no vote is to be taken on any proposition before 2 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, before proceeding to other matters that seem to me of some consequence, I wish to advert to a trifling occurrence of last evening at the close of the debate, in which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] assumed to criticise me with some little verbal severity, which is so foreign to his nature that I know it was simply verbal, in regard to an expression which I had used in my remarks the other day touching the sentiment of his own people as exhibited by an utterance or a resolution of the Legislature of his State. He quotes my expression, but makes a wrongful application of it.

He assumes that I had stated, which I did not state and which the RECORD which he examined shows that I did not state for he quoted it with such verbal accuracy as to show that he had referred to it—he assumes that I stated that he had been instructed by his Legislature unanimously. An examination of the RECORD reveals nothing of the kind. I said nothing of the kind; I had nothing of the sort in my mind; and the Senator neither heard nor read in the RECORD in my remarks anything which really justified him in giving or endeavoring to give to the country the impression that I had in any wise misrepresented the action of his State.

His colleague used in his remarks an expression indicating that the Legislature had given instructions to the Senators. I used no such remark and I had no such impression; but the Legislature of his State, so far as I know—and in my statement I relied upon information received from a Senator of his own State—did when this bill was pending before, or a short time before it was considered, give a unanimous indorsement to the principles of the bill and to the bill itself so far as all its essential features are concerned, and in fact in everything except that they expressed a desire that the distribution should be made through the superintendents of the States. In the discussion of the bill which preceded its final passage, it was objected by representatives of the Southern States that it would be better that this money should be appropriated directly to the States and all interference with its management after it became a portion of the funds of the State should be dispensed with, and therefore that the National Government ought not to assume to give directions to the State superintendent or to any other State officer, and the bill was passed free from that objection accordingly.

The Senator then goes on giving utterance to his sentiment of hostility to the common schools as a system by premising some matters with reference to a bill that I had the honor to introduce to the Senate, twice introduced by request—a bill drawn by a gentleman living in the city of New York, a gentleman who is clerk or secretary of the Civil Service Commission, as I understand, a gentleman of character and of education and many accomplishments, who has a project of securing trifling national legislation the purpose of which is to enable poorer people connected with some association with which he is himself connected, I suppose, to invest their funds in the national lands. He asks by his bill that an amount of national land not exceeding 1,000,000 acres may be acquired by the savings of these industrious people, and this investment he considers as perhaps safer than almost any other form in which their savings can be placed. Therefore he would like that legislation. I introduced the bill, and it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, just exactly as other Senators introduce bills; and simply because it had a little phraseology in it which is not exactly in consonance with the best formula of legislation, it seems to have attracted the attention of the Senator from Alabama, and of others. But the bill itself is an exceedingly innocent bill, as I should judge, and for a praiseworthy object. After denouncing this as a wild, agrarian measure, and endeavoring to associate my name with it in an offensive way somewhat, he goes on to denounce this bill, the object of which is the establishment of common-schools as a like wild and agrarian bill.

This is all a very trifling matter. I simply allude to it for the reason that the Senator thought it was worth while to waste considerable time upon it, and make this explanation that the real facts may be understood by the Senate. Of course it is all of very slight consequence.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] who is not in his seat today made a strong and somewhat extraordinary speech against this bill before the Senate yesterday afternoon. The animus of that address, which was to the country rather than to the Senate, as the Senator himself stated in his opening remarks, was so extraordinary that I must confess that if I occupied the standpoint from which he looks at this measure I should be among its violent opponents. He seems to feel that in some way the citizenship in the Southern States at the present time, the American people, so far as they live in the Southern States, ought to be visited with the consequences of an order of things that was destroyed by the war, and that what ever of guilt there may have been in the establishment of the institution of slavery, whatever there may have been anywhere either upon the whole nation or upon any section of it, these people still in the Southern States should be held responsible for it and suffer to the uttermost all the consequences that can be made to flow from it.

I have no such animus; neither do I undertake to claim that I am the special friend of any section of the country. I would be glad for the general good that sound principles of legislation should be adopted and made applicable everywhere; and in urging the adoption of this measure, I believe it to be for the general good that education should become general and illiteracy should be reduced to the lowest minimum possible. It is as much my concern in New Hampshire whether illiteracy in Alabama or Louisiana or Texas or any other State controls the choice of a President as it is the matter of the inhabitants of that State. It is as much my concern whether the unity and perpetuity of this Government be preserved as it is that of any other citizen whatever; and it is as important that I should contribute all my means to the education of the children on the borders of the country as it is that I should assist in the education of those who control its great centers. It is for such reasons, and only for reasons of this kind, that this measure can be justified.

Men who look upon it from the standpoint of the Senator from Kansas, men who are controlled to-day by the same prejudices that hurried us to the war and which must cease if there is ever to be any permanent peace, can not of course appreciate a measure of this kind. They do well to give utterance to their sentiments; but I do not believe that, either North or South, they represent one-tenth of the American population. I believe that the people desire that the whole country should participate in the benefits which are to be derived from the national revenue and that those conditions be established everywhere which are indispensable to the universal good of our people.

It is of very little use to denounce those who may be in need from any cause whatever in any section of the country. That is no way to cure the evil. Suppose by reason of the violent opposition which is made directly and indirectly to the passage of this bill, that it be defeated; what is the prospect of any alleviation resulting from that fate of this bill to the great evil which we all concede and which we all desire to remove? Will it stimulate the people of the South who are already bending under more burdens than they can bear, when they have already done their uttermost to remove this evil? In the school districts throughout the Southern country the people have for years been looking anxiously for this assistance to add a little to their short terms of school. Will it encourage them in their poverty to find that the great North which they look upon as having given them their liberty and who pledged themselves in platforms, in messages, and in the utterances of conventions to assist in their education—will it encourage them to greater efforts if you defeat this bill? What tendency has it to remove the evil? What tendency to stimulate to greater exertions those who are suffering from it can it have to destroy their strong and reasonable hope of generous aid?

Is it any discredit to the Southern country or any other portion of the world that it is in need of charitable assistance? Is it any encouragement to them to deprive them of that which might satisfy their necessity? The benevolent institutions, the religious organizations, and benevolent individuals of the North have already deposited in the Southern land $25,000,000 in aid of the establishment of schools; and to-day the colored man in the South is better cared for by reason of Northern benevolence in this regard than is the white child in the matter of education. Has anybody ever thought of blaming the South with its reception of the income of the Peabody fund, or of the Slater fund, or of the $25,000,000 that the religious denominations of the North have expended in that section of our country?

And, further, has the distribution of this money resulted at all in any lack of the necessary self-help? On the contrary all statistics and all statements of intelligent observers prove that a very powerful stimulus has been given to the cause of education by these very means. Consider that the common school was not indigenous to the South. Until within a very few years it was a hostile institution to their system of labor, and their laws were against it; and the common white people as well as the colored people shared in the inimical effect of those laws and in the dominance of what was then the aristocratic power in the Southern States.

Only twenty years since the common school was legalized; it is less than twenty years since it was actually legalized in the Southern States. As a legal institution it only began to exist with any efficiency from about the year 1868. Since that time, it has become, as I expressed it the other day, acclimated; it has been established as a system in every Southern State. The carpet-bag governments did this good to the South if nothing else. They gave that people systems of common schools; and as those governments passed away and the control of that portion of the country was once more taken into the hands of the white and educated element, they retained those systems; they have enlarged them; they have improved them; and the management of those systems has fallen into the hands of the very best men of the South, the religious, the upright, the educated men, men who manage these school funds such as the Southern States have raised as intelligently and apply them as economically and as usefully as the like amount of money is applied in any portion of our country.

All this help has had the effect to establish and to stimulate, to increase the forces of the common-school system in the South. Now, if we are to judge at all by experience, giving them more help, the exhibition of a friendly and neighborly and national feeling on the part of the General Government, giving them more money to enlarge these institutions, must have the like effect.

Why, sir, it seems to be held by some of my friends on this side of the Chamber as a reason for withholding this money that the influence of Southern society is opposed to its reception. "If they do not want it, let them go without it," gentlemen say. These men, as I believe, represent mathematically and influentially but a trifling portion of the Southern people. But suppose that that were the general sentiment of the South, is that any reason why we should withhold our hands? Does it not, on the contrary, establish by irrefragable proof a still stronger necessity of giving this help, of establishing in some way the school? Those who do not understand its work and its good influences might naturally, considering former prejudices and conditions, be opposed to it; but when they become acquainted with the practical working of the institution, then, as we see already demonstrated in the experience of the past ten years, they are likely to become more and more attached to it and to fasten their hopes, as numbers of people do everywhere, on the efficiency of a system of proper common-school education.

So far then, if there were an unwillingness to receive this money and to apply it properly, from that constituting any real reason of opposition to the bill, it establishes in a still stronger sense the necessity of the distribution and proper application of this money from the national Treasury.

The Senator from Kansas alluded to the fact that immigration is not as general to the South as it ought to be, and he strangely opposed the passage of this bill because there are no common schools, and the fact that there were no efficient common schools as a rule in the Southern States is objected to by the intelligent immigrants from the North and from foreign lands. The very reason that he gives for opposing this bill is the strongest possible reason for the passage of the bill. Give the South common schools, and the Northern immigrant would often go there in preference to the prairies of the West. Nothing has arrested the development of the South like the fact that these schools do not exist there. We all remember how soon after the close of the war the mass of Northern feeling and spirit was turned toward the South. The war was over; the cause of the war was destroyed.

There was never, so far as I know, on the part of the North one single particle of that feeling which we may term personal hostility toward the South. We fought the South for the common good; and so far as I know, certainly so far as I was myself concerned, without the slightest feeling of personal hostility to any man or any body of men who lived there. We believed their course was destructive to the national welfare, that the Union ought not to be dissolved, that slavery should be destroyed; and we fought in God's name to accomplish all of those purposes; and when they were accomplished we looked upon the Southern people as our brethren as much as we ever did before, and more so, because she was to have a future that was homogeneous with our own, and the great cause of difference between the sections was passing away, and the whole Republic seemed likely for the future to be really independent and free.

So the feeling turned, as I said, to the South in all kindliness and with an anxiety on the part of our immigrant population to settle in that portion of the country. But what did the Northern men find there? Accustomed to common schools, and understanding that the primal necessity in the raising of a family was to educate the child, the father found no school for his child; he found hostility to the school system, the teacher often abused, the school-house often burned, and persecution toward that system which alone, by permeating the entire population, could create real freedom, and he got away and staid away, and he has remained away, and he will remain away, and so will the intelligent immigrant from abroad avoid that country, blessed as it is by nature with everything that makes it desirable as a home, the loveliest, most fertile, and desirable region of the entire country. So I say that immigration will forever remain away from the South until she has such opportunities for the education of the children of the immigrant as are to be found in other parts of the country.

The Senator from Kansas dwells very much upon his table, which he produced here, by which he endeavored to show to the country how enormously disproportionate are the benefits that are to be received from this bill if it shall become a law. He reads to us his table in which he says, Alabama, for instance, gets out of this fund of $77,000,000 for the whole eight years $5,370,848, and she pays $1,767,507; California gets $662,051, and pays $1,210,571; and so he goes through with all the States and calls attention with great vigor to the account which I shall be obliged to render to my constituents for advocating the passage of this bill. He says New Hampshire gets $177,216 and pays $485,787, and he appeals to me to know whether I can settle this account with the producing laborers of my own State. His table, as he says, is based upon population, and he assumes that the burden of Federal taxation, the collection of Federal revenue, falls upon the people of the country per capita, as though the whole were raised by a direct tax and raised also as a direct tax on the individual men, women, and children alike.

If this were so it would still be the better thing to pass this bill, and I believe that for the general good the people of New Hampshire would be willing to pay the difference beyond what they receive—a people frugal and hardy and not wealthy, but a people patriotic and intelligent, and knowing that the common school is the only bond of union and peace to the whole country in future time. And he is but a poor student of history or human nature who believes that the perpetuity of this country, its freedom from wars, such as we have seen in our own day and generation, can be preserved unless we make our institutions and the condition of our people homogeneous and intelligent, and who does not recognize the common school as the only instrumentality by which that can be accomplished. So, as a matter of dollars and cents, it is cheaper for New Hampshire to pay, not this difference which the Senator speaks of, but ten times that difference in order that we may be preserved from the consequences of ignorance, which is the essence of slavery, and thus secure immunity from future wars.

But, sir, the Senator is all wrong as to the basis of his table. Taxation is not raised, as he well knows and as the Senate well knows, or at least should understand on second thought, in any such way. The Federal revenues come in an altogether different way; they do not come out of the poor people of this country. Myself and the Senator, the school of politics to which we belong, the faith which the Republican party professes is entirely in the contrary direction. By the method which we employ Federal taxation needs to be large in order to conduce to a great extent to the good of the laboring people of the country.

We believe in the protective system. We have established it and we have enforced it as against all comers, and our Democratic friends have assisted us to such an extent that for many years it has been the law of the land, and I trust in God it may remain so for all time. By virtue of that system of taxation which is levied upon the luxuries and not upon the necessaries of life, the national is almost the only tax which comes out of the pockets of the wealthy and not out of the pockets of the poor. By that taxation we raise almost two hundred millions of the little more than three hundred millions of annual national revenue.

On this point—for I consider it a vital one, as I wish to combat something of the other heresies in the Senator's speech which should be replied to—I wish to insert a table from the first page of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1885, which shows the sources of national revenue.

From customs, to which I have just been alluding, we receive $181,471,939.34. That is the largest item. I have stated where that comes from, not out of the laboring poor, but out of the accumulating rich. Internal revenue gives us $112,498,725.54, and the internal revenue, as we know, is taken from intoxicating drinks, spirituous liquors, and from tobacco, the great mass of it, almost the whole of it. During the year 1884 our revenue from distilled spirits was $76,905,385.26; from tobacco in all its forms, $26,062,399.98; from fermented liquors, $18,084,954.11. These items which represent taxation upon wealth only in the form of comfort, taxation upon our luxuries and indulgences in vice, in the consumption of liquors, distilled and fermented, wines, and tobacco—these items comprise the great sources of revenue, and from which would come the expenditure under this bill. The other items I will read from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury himself:

From sales of public lands	$5,705,986 44
From tax on national banks	2,914,222 25
From profits on coinage, bullion deposits, and assays	6,051,284 96
From customs fees, fines, penalties, &c	907,464 27
From fees—consular, letters patent, and lands	3,714,613 58
From repayment of interest by Pacific railway companies	1,608,071 58
From sinking-fund for Pacific railway companies	2,476,707 78
From deposits by individuals for surveying public lands	594,414 34
From proceeds of sales of Government property	302,882 07
From Indian trust-funds	76,942 08
From immigrant fund	177,002 50
From Soldiers' Home, permanent fund	333,735 05
From sale of condemned naval vessels	55,541 80
From tax on tonnage	400,342 46
From revenues of the District of Columbia	1,929,298 11
From miscellaneous sources	2,471,532 23

That comprises the whole; and I appeal to any Senator who may think as the Senator from Kansas does—he not now being in his seat—if there is a dollar of that taxation going into the Federal Treasury which comes out of the pockets of the poor if republican theories as to the effect of customs taxation are correct. No, sir. I look upon our system of Federal taxation as a benefit to the poor. It is one great means, and the only great all-comprehending means that we now have of fastening where it belongs the great burden of society upon its accumulated wealth and taxing those accumulations and applying them to the great ends which are for the general good. Can there be any more righteous thing to do than by this form of taxation to place the burden of the education of the child of the poor man upon the accumulated wealth of the rich man which he has been able under the laws of the land to gather for himself largely from the muscle and brain of the industrious poor? That is our theory. You may call it a leveling theory, but it is the theory upon which this bill and republican creeds are built.

There is other matter that I wish to notice in the speech of the honorable Senator from Kansas. The bill calls for a small amount yearly. We ought to consider that every year the question of the further appropriation is subject to the action of Congress, subject, if you please, to the action of the Senate, which is Republican at present and likely to be so, I trust, for a long time to come; and if it is found that the appropriation of any given year is not properly applied or that it does not do the amount of good which is necessary in order to justify a still further appropriation—if that is found to be so, by the express terms of this bill itself the appropriation is to cease.

Take our river and harbor appropriation. It is not likely for the years to come to average less than from twelve to fifteen million dollars a year. In the next ten years we are likely to expend from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty million dollars in that direction alone. This bill, subject to all these contingencies and conditions, proposes to give at the uttermost the amount of $77,000,000, and for a cause and to remove a necessity vastly more pressing and dangerous to the American people than impediment to navigation.

The Senator might just as well endeavor to excite the hostility of the people of my State against the river and harbor bill by showing that the people of New Hampshire, who never have had money enough out of it to pay the ordinary candy bills of the children of the State—and the river and harbor bill is very important to himself and to the States of the great West generally—as to undertake to excite a like hostility against this. The people of New Hampshire in either case are broad enough and patriotic enough to contribute from their earnings, if it came from their earnings, so much as is indispensable for the general national good. Wherever they put their blood they are ready to put their money.

The Senator himself is a strong advocate of a measure which I believe to be just and to which his party is committed as it is to this measure. He says we ought to contribute to-day, we ought to enact proper legislation and to make the consequent appropriation to pay the arrears of pensions, which have lately been computed at over $300,000,000, approaching four times the amount that is proposed by this bill; and no computation can make the sum that will be called for less than $225,000,000 or $250,000,000. He proposes that without any hesitation, and that taxation comes out of the poor, if any taxation comes from that class of our fellow-men.

So I might speak of other pension legislation of which I am an advocate as well as himself. I believe that in the case of every Union soldier, every man who rendered good service to his country who is now in need of assistance from any source, whether it be from charity or from his relatives or from the poor-rates of the country, it is the duty of this nation, which exists because he fought for it, to supply him with an honorable support to the extent of his necessity. We passed a bill of that kind in the last Congress and sent it to the House of Representatives where it died, and we prided ourselves somewhat in our appeals to the people of this country, to the soldiers of this country and their friends, that we had passed so liberal, so just, and as I believe so wise a measure; but it was to take from the funds of this country enormously beyond the amount called for by this bill for the support of common schools.

The Senator alluded to this bill as having grown out of that feverish condition of the party mind which precedes a Presidential election. Sir, that is not the case. The ideas of this bill have been pending in the northern portion of this country for the last twenty years. Grant recommended these appropriations. Hayes recommended these appropriations. Garfield delivered the noblest utterance in his first and only message in favor of these appropriations. The Republican platform for at least two campaigns has contained this same proposition, Federal aid to common schools wherever it is necessary.

It is not a new idea. True it is we passed this bill immediately preceding the last Presidential election. We passed it in April. In all its essential features we wrote this bill for Federal aid wherever it was necessary into our platform the following June and appealed to the people, on the strength of that provision, for their support, and we received many votes by it. I think, sir, that even if it had grown out of a "feverish condition" of the party mind it would still be our duty to keep our plighted faith to the public. I do not understand because we have made promises to the American people of what we would do that we made them in a base barter for votes—that when the time comes to perform them we are therefore excused and called upon to demonstrate our own corruption and make good the allegations of the Senator from Kansas. I am for keeping the faith of parties as I would keep the national faith, for this is a government of parties, and only as parties are to be depended upon to keep their promises and redeem their pledges can we expect the nation which is controlled by a dominant party to preserve its honor under the management of that party.

The question is not between the men who on the one side and the other fought the war; the question is not between them at all, and no sophistry can conceal the real issue which is between the American nation and the American child. If the Senator from Alabama who rises here and thanks God that he is not to be bribed in this way has any children of his own to be properly educated, and if others who following him denounce the constitutionality of this bill, or for any reason whatever oppose it, are justified, nevertheless the Republican and the Northern man and the American citizen who believes that by reason of their opposition justifies the rejection of this bill has misconceived the true issue—he has made a mistake. The real issue, as I said before, is between the nation and the child, and for one I am not willing to stand here and say that the son of a confederate officer or soldier shall not be educated as well as the child of his former slave. Give them both equal privileges in the direction of education, give them both the same chance to prepare for the future of American citizenship.

I do not know but that it was unfortunate that the discussion of this bill immediately followed the appeals that were made to prejudice both North and South during the discussion of the Dakota bill. I thought our Southern friends might well have exhibited a different spirit, and if I were called upon to judge I would justify something of the feeling that has been exhibited on this side of the Chamber when I remember the spirit in which that bill was met. But my friend from Kansas ought to remember that the very gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who opposed the Dakota bill so violently are the men who oppose the education bill in the same spirit and, in fact, with still stronger expression of virulence and hate. And is the fact that these men oppose the Dakota bill and likewise oppose this bill any reason why those who made war upon them in the former discussion should shake hands with them at the present time, and that they should unite in a common effort to defeat this measure? One would have inferred that the contrary would have been the case if it had not been otherwise illustrated on this floor.

Mr. President, I wish to call a little closer the attention of the Senate to what has been done with reference to this bill and the general propositions which pervade it hitherto by the North—and by "the North" I mean the Republican party. I read now from the Republican platform adopted at Chicago in 1884. In the eleventh section of the platform are to be found these words. Among other clauses pledging the party to various measures which were supposed to be in the interest of the working people of this country and in other directions, a sound currency and the like, are these words:

> We favor the establishment of * * * a wise and judicious system of general education by adequate appropriation from the national revenues wherever the same is needed.

In another section of the same platform is a pledge to pass whatsoever legislation is necessary to the assistance of the white Republicans in the South in the attainment and the enjoyment of all their rights and privileges, civil and political. If there is anything essential as a primary condition to the development and the enjoyment of the rights of American citizenship at the South, and especially, I may say, of the Republicans at the South, it is the common school, which will give to every individual who receives its benefits that sense of manhood and that intelligence which will make him, knowing his rights, dare to maintain them, and he will maintain them; and it is only the man who has that quality of mind and that quality of body who is likely to defend the rights conferred upon him by the Declaration and by the principles of the Republican party.

The Republican platform of 1880, as I recollect it, contained a like provision. I will take the liberty of reading to the Senate a few utterances of the party and of its representative men upon this very subject. In the Republican platform of 1880 we took this position:

> The work of popular education is one left to the care of the several States, but it is the duty of the National Government to aid that work to the extent of its constitutional power. The intelligence of the nation is but the aggregate of the intelligence in the several States, and the destiny of the nation must be guided, not by the genius of any one State, but by the aggregate genius of all.

And from the call of the national committee as adopted in the call of the Republican State convention in Maine to choose delegates to Chicago in the convention held in 1884 I find this:

> Without regard to past political differences, who are in favor of elevating and dignifying American labor, protecting and extending home industries, giving free popular education to the masses of the people, securing free suffrage and an honest counting of ballots.

As I said earlier, in the platform is laid down the language which I have read. These utterances of which I now speak were in the June following the passage of this bill in the Senate on April, 1884. I will read now from the message of President Garfield, in which he said—and I ask the Senate to remember that it was President Garfield who said this—we would do well to listen to this voice from the tombs:

> But the danger which arises from ignorance in the voter can not be denied. It covers a field far wider than that of negro suffrage, and the present condition of the race. It is a danger that lurks and hides in the sources and fountains of power in every State. We have no standard by which to measure the disaster that may be brought upon us by ignorance and vice in the citizen when joined to corruption and fraud in the suffrage.
> The voters of the Union who make and unmake constitutions, and upon whose will hang the destinies of our governments, can transmit their supreme authority to no successors save the coming generation of voters, who are the sole heirs of sovereign power. If that generation comes to its inheritance blinded by ignorance and corrupted by vice, the fall of the Republic will be certain and remediless.
> The census has already sounded the alarm in the appalling figures which mark how dangerously high the tide of illiteracy has risen among our voters and their children.
> To the South this question is of supreme importance, but the responsibility for the existence of slavery did not rest upon the South alone. The nation itself is responsible for the extension of the suffrage, and is under special obligations to aid in removing the illiteracy which it has added to the voting population. For the North and South alike there is but one remedy. All the constitutional power of the nation and of the States and all the volunteer forces of the people should be summoned to meet this danger by the strong influence of universal education.

However feverish may have been the feeling which led to the utterance of these sentiments, scattered over a long period of time, it survives until the present time, and whatever be the fate of this measure the evil will exist and will increase and this sentiment will survive and increase until by some like measure the evil is diminished and destroyed, and it will never become an obsolete issue, never an issue which we can avoid or evade until it is settled either by the ruin of our country or by its extinction in the complete establishment everywhere of the common school.

I have here utterances of President Hayes, President Grant, and Chief-Justice Waite. Perhaps I ought to put into these remarks various citations from the fathers of the Republic, from Horace Mann and other educators and statesmen of the past. I have here the report of the trustees of the Peabody educational fund, a report discussing the same questions, citing the fathers, Jefferson, Adams, Washington, of course, Madison, Monroe, all to the same general effect; and whatever may have been the earlier views of some of these men in regard to the constitutional power of educating the people for the general welfare, their later and riper views were in favor of the full extent of the power which we claim and of its immediate and general exercise. I read from page 4 of the report of the trustees of the Peabody fund:

> Washington, in his farewell address, condenses into two short sentences an admonition which should never be forgotten by the American people. "Promote, then," says he, "as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened."
> The writings of John Adams are replete with expressions of his estimate of the value of popular education as the best safeguard of free institutions.
> In a letter to Mr. Yancey, dated January 6, 1816, Mr. Jefferson says: "If a nation expects to be ignorant and free in a state of civilization, it expects what never will be. The functionaries of every government have propensities to command at will the liberty and property of their constituents. There is no safe deposit for them but with the people themselves; nor can they be safe with them without information. Where the press is free, and every man able to read, all is safe." In another letter to Governor Nicholas, dated April 2, 1816, speaking of his system of elementary education, he says: "My partiality for that division is not founded in view of education solely, but infinitely more as a means of the better administration of our Government and the eternal preservation of its republican principles."
> Mr. Madison, who has been called the father of our Federal Constitution, and who certainly contributed as much as any other man in framing its provisions, was equally emphatic in the expression of his opinions of the value of popular education. In a letter to William T. Barry, of Kentucky, dated August 4, 1826, he says: "A popular government without popular information, or the means of acquiring it, is but a prologue to a farce or tragedy, or perhaps both. Knowledge will forever govern ignorance, and a people who mean to be their own governors must arm themselves with the power which knowledge gives." In another letter, to Littleton D. Teakle, of Maryland, Mr. Madison says: "The best service that can be rendered to a country, next to that of giving it liberty, is in diffusing the mental improvement essential to the preservation and enjoyment of the blessing."
> Quotations of a similar character, from the writings of the statesmen and sages of the earliest days of the Republic, might be indefinitely multiplied, but your committee will content themselves with adding a single extract from the inaugural address of President Monroe, delivered on the 4th of March, 1817.
> Had the people of the United States been educated in different principles, had they been less intelligent, less independent, or less virtuous, can it be believed that we should have maintained the same steady and consistent career, or been blessed with the same success? While, then, the constituent body retains its present sound and healthful state all will be safe. It is only when the people become ignorant and corrupt, when they degenerate into a populace, that they become incapable of exercising sovereignty. Usurpation is an easy attainment, and a usurper soon found. The people themselves become the willing instruments of their own debasement and ruin. Let us look to the great cause, and endeavor to preserve it in full force. Let us, by all wise and constitutional measures, promote intelligence among the people as the best means of preserving our liberties.

Speaking more particularly of the Southern condition, that body of great men, the trustees of the Peabody fund, more cognizant probably with the real Southern status at that time than anybody else, say, speaking especially of the colored people:

> We are thus compelled to face the fact that more than half a million of voters, scattered over half the Union, from illiteracy are notoriously incompetent to the intelligent discharge of the public duties intrusted to them. This large class of uneducated voters, it must be remembered, are not merely citizens and voters of the States in which they respectively reside: they are also citizens of the United States. The power which they wield and the influence which they exert is not merely local: it is coextensive with the Union. Their votes may decide the issues of peace or war; they may control Presidential elections and give shape to the policy of the nation; they are entitled to participate in the election of President and Vice-President, of members of the House of Representatives, and of the State Legislatures which choose Senators of the United States; they elect governors and legislators of their respective States, and in many States, judges, clerks, sheriffs, supervisors, magistrates, and almost every officer intrusted with the administration of public affairs; they are themselves eligible to all positions of honor, trust, and emolument, and legally competent to act as judges or to sit as jurors in cases involving the most sacred rights of life, liberty, and property.

As I do not mean to occupy the time of the Senate unduly, I shall omit further extracts from the report, but I do wish to read from an address delivered by Horace Mann the following, given at page 8:

> The illustrious and noble band who framed the Constitution of the Union—Washington, Franklin, Adams, Jefferson, Madison—who adjusted all the principles which it contains by the line and the plummet, and weighed the words which describe them in scales so nice as to tremble beneath the dust of the balance, expended the energies of their mighty minds to perfect an instrument which, before half a century had passed away, was doomed to be administered, controlled, expounded, by men unable to read and write. The power of Congress over all the great social and economical interests of this vast country; the orbits in which the States are to move around the central body in the system: the functions of the Executive, who holds in his hand the Army and the Navy, manages all diplomatic relations with foreign powers, and can involve the country at any time in the horrors of war; and that grand poising power, the supreme judiciary, appointed to be the presiding intelligence over the system, to harmonize its motions and to hold its attracting and diverging tendencies in equilibrium—all this splendid structure, the vastest and nicest ever devised by mortals, is under the control of men who are incapable of reading one word of the language which describes its framework and defines its objects and its guards, incapable of reading one word of contemporaneous exposition, of antecedent history, or of subsequent development, and therefore make it include anything or exclude anything, as their blind passions may dictate. Phaeton was less a fool when he mounted the chariot to drive the horses of the sun than ourselves, if we expect to reach the zenith of prosperity and happiness under such guidance.

These seem commonplaces, and yet they are denied on the floor of the Senate, and it is necessary even here to revert to first principles.

There has been perhaps already a sufficiency of evidence of fact as bearing upon the contributions of the General Government in the form of public lands and otherwise to the maintenance of school systems in the States, and I shall not take the time of the Senate any further in that direction.

I wish to add to the great Republican authorities and the great national authorities of earlier times from which I have cited a few contemporary names of men who were in this Chamber during the last discussion upon this bill. The present Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lamar, and Attorney-General Garland, as all will remember, made eloquent and exceedingly able speeches in support of the bill, dealing to some extent with the constitutional questions involved and also dealing with the actual necessity, conceding and claiming the power and the duty of the Government to make these appropriations and the necessity that exists for their use.

I should like to read, and will read to the Senate, a line from the report of the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lamar, showing that in his new position and as the man who will have a revision of the expenditure of this fund in connection with Congress, he still retains his interest in this great measure and desires its enactment into a law. He says in his report to the present Congress, page 85, under the caption of Education:

> The report of the Commissioner of Education is an instructive and interesting document. I have been unable, for want of time, to present even a brief of the views and recommendations therein set forth, the greater part of which meet my concurrence, especially his renewed invocation of Federal aid to insure adequate provision for the instruction of the freedmen of the South, and also his recommendation that some measure of Federal aid be extended to public primary education, based on the number of illiterates in the various States as shown by the Tenth Census.

This is not the only time that the voice of a Secretary of the Interior has been raised in behalf of this or a like measure. It was done in the reports of the former Secretary of the Interior, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]; and if there was a word of unpleasantness between us the other day I desire again to apologize, if it be necessary, because I know his goodness of heart and my own hasty temper, and perhaps I was provoked; I desire to do him the justice to say that no man ever gave forth nobler utterances in favor of national aid to universal education. He was among the earliest men who advocated substantial relief to the South in the discussion in the Forty-sixth Congress when the Morrill bill was passed, for, I think, the third time by the Senate. I will ask the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] if it was not the third time?

Mr. MORRILL. A similar bill.

Mr. BLAIR. A similar bill, but what was known as the Morrill measure, and a measure whose feature I mean, if I have it in my power to help it, shall become the law of the land. In that discussion the only objection made to the bill on this side of the Chamber was that it did not give enough. Its theory was the establishment of a fund that would gradually accumulate and in all future time, while not controlling or dominating over the schools of the country would yet give a little to their support, and especially of the industrial feature, the colleges of agriculture and of the mechanic arts. The objection, as I said, made to the bill was that it did not meet the existing emergency, and that there should be something provided for temporary aid, but the principle was right, and every constitutional principle involved in this bill was in that. The theory of that measure concerning the machinery, as it was called, was more generally acceptable to both sides of the Chamber than to my own individual mind, and it commanded almost the universal support of both sides of the Chamber.

But, as I said, some objected to it that it did not give enough, and the fact that there is an immediate emergency was the origin of this bill, which proposes to make for the time being a much more liberal contribution. In that debate the Senator from Colorado by his remarks first attracted my attention to the necessity of a much greater contribution or appropriation than that bill provided. He passed from the Senate. I remained in it, and by the action of the Senate was placed upon the Committee on Education and Labor, and we set about fashioning the various bills, notable among which was the bill of Senator LOGAN, of Illinois, which provided for an appropriation of eighty millions annually, and was a just recognition of the great necessity—combining the same idea into the one that we thought would be acceptable to the Senate, and we reported such a bill to that Congress, both branches of which were Republican and the Executive the same.

That bill was not this bill in all its features. It was a bill which provided that there should be more, not of Federal supervision, but of actual Federal control. It provided that there should be appointed in every State a Federal commissioner from among the citizens of the State, nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and that he in connection with the superintendent of public instruction for the State should decide where the money should go and how it should be distributed and divided, each having a veto upon the other, and there being no money save so far as they agreed; but it was opposed on this side of the Chamber as containing a feature of interference with the local schools, for the State rights people are not all of them sitting opposite to us. The bill could not command the full support of the Republican side of the Chamber, and though I pressed it with all the urgency of which I was capable, it was found impossible to secure for it consideration during that Congress, when we had the power to make the bill and to make the law as we might see fit, having the control of every department of the Government.

In the next Congress, the Forty-eighth, the evil remaining and increasing, and the necessity being as great or greater than ever, it was thought that in some way the situation must be met, and this bill, adopting the machinery of the Morrill bill for distribution, was brought into the Senate and was argued three weeks in the Senate and passed by a three-fourths vote of the Senate; and as passed by the Senate after that three-fourths vote it was in substance made a leading feature of the Republican Presidential platform adopted in the June following, and as so passed it was brought by your committee to the Senate in the present Congress; and the bill that we started with and are dealing with is the bill thus perfected by the action of the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress.

I have previously spoken upon the real inadequacy, though it would do an immense good, of the amount of the appropriation which is here proposed; but at this time at least I shall not dwell longer upon that point. I wish, however, in passing, to ask those who dwell upon the enormous amount of this contribution to consider that in the year 1836 we took from the national Treasury at one time $28,000,000 and distributed it to the States in a single year. All this bill calls for now is $7,000,000; and we took $28,000,000 at a time when the valuation of this country was not more than one-fourth what it is to-day, and when the population was not more than 16,000,000, whereas it is now 60,000,000. Under those circumstances we took from the national Treasury and poured into the treasury of the States $28,000,000. It was an extravagance beyond that which we propose at the present time more than tenfold in amount, as I doubt not any one will find who takes care to work out its mathematical proportions from the data I have stated.

That money you say was wasted, some of it. Some of it was wasted. How was it wasted? By the expenditure of the principal in most cases in the cause of education, and instead of appearing to-day in many of the States in the form of a permanent fund the interest whereon is available to educate the children, it went into the brain and heart and soul of the children at the time, making the very best form of investment, so that that generation rose to a greater height of intelligence and of prosperity, and our country to-day is stronger and grander because the whole was spent, "wasted," as it is expressed by some, instead of being invested in a permanent fund.

But that was not the case with all of it. In nearly every one of the States a portion of that money still survives, appropriated in the form of annual interest to the cause of common-school education. But did it ever do any harm to education? Were the States of the North by this contribution from the national Treasury induced to neglect their schools? Did they become "leeches" upon the public Treasury? Have they been any less liberal and generous in submitting to personal taxation in the maintenance of their schools and their other institutions by reason of that contribution from the national funds? Sir, on the contrary common schools never were encouraged at the North as they have been during the last forty or fifty years. The institution is stronger and more beneficent to-day than ever before. I believe one of the fathers says that he asks only for the lamp of experience as a guide for his footsteps. If experience is to be our guide, we ought to have made these contributions years ago and to have made them longer still. So long as the evil continues we ought to meet it with the appropriate remedy.

It has been charged upon our friends of the South that because there was slavery and because there was war, therefore they should take care of all the consequences resulting therefrom and should educate their own children; that for the reason that they have done so much of evil they should make the necessary sacrifice to rescue themselves regardless of their ability to do it. I think it is due to history to say that it was not the North alone that put down the rebellion and destroyed the institution of slavery. If the thing is to be measured upon that theory even, it is a fact that may be well stated here on the floor of the Senate that the Southern States gave us over four hundred thousand of the men enlisted into the Union Army.

I have here a table which I will have printed in full, but I shall read what it contains with reference to the contribution of Union troops from Southern States. Maryland gave us 46,638; West Virginia, 32,068; Missouri, 109,111; Kentucky, 75,760; Tennessee, 31,092; Arkansas, 8,289; North Carolina, 3,156; Alabama, 2,576; Florida, 1,290; Louisiana, 5,224; Mississippi, 545, and Texas, 1,965, making an aggregate of white soldiers from the slave States actually in the rebellion (for I think Missouri might as well be classed that way) of 317,714 men. In addition to those, there were mustered into service 99,327 colored troops, and it is estimated that beyond this number there were actually in the service another 100,000 of colored troops, making the whole number of colored troops actually in the service not far from 200,000. Reduced to three years' service, there were enlisted into the war on the side of the Union arms 2,320,369 men, including negroes. Of this number very nearly or quite half a million were from the slave States, so that they contributed of their blood and something of their money to the maintenance of the cause of the Union.

But we are dealing with the great masses of the Southern people, who were always for the Union, and for the children of those men who were always for the Union. I do not think I am in danger of any contradiction even on this floor, where there are witnesses who could contradict me if I were under a mistake, when I say that had the masses of the Southern people been educated they never would have rebelled. It would have been impossible for three hundred thousand men to have instituted that great war which came so near destroying the Government if this educational bill had been passed and applied ten years before the war.

The table in full is as follows:

†Revised [30 Enr. Div., A. G. O., 1886].

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, November 9, 1880.

I wish to discuss now one feature of the bill which has been criticised in the press by prominent individuals who have at heart the general cause which the bill seeks to promote, and, if I may, to defend it against some aggressive but mistaken attacks. I think in the feature to which I now allude the bill is right. It is not as it is for want of sufficient consideration. If the committee are wrong, they are wrong after long study and deep reflection.

It has been claimed and all concede that the best test or measure for the distribution of the money in the first instance as between the States is according to the illiteracy shown by the census of 1880. In fact there seems to be no other reliable and just test that you can find. I think it will be conceded that the true test of distribution as between the States would be made up of two complex propositions or ratios. It should depend upon the actual necessity for education in the different States and the power to bear taxation in the State to relieve that necessity. These two ideas combined, if they were data by which they could be measured and multiplied into each other, would give the true ratio of distribution between the States.

But there is not in the census, there is nowhere any measure of the capacity of the several States to bear taxation for the support of common schools that seems to be entirely satisfactory. The property in all but three of the Southern States has been diminished in value very largely during the last ten years. Eliminate all about freeing the slaves, commence with the census of 1870 and compare the condition of the Northern and the Southern States as in 1870 with their condition in 1880, and we find that there has been a diminution of valuation for taxable purposes in the Southern States of over $400,000,000. That indicates, of course, a lack of prosperity, inactivity in business, want of the proper diversification of occupations, a lack of ready money and of those available sources of taxation which are to be found in all Northern States where there are bonds and currency and money in the pockets of the people, personal property easily to be disposed of, taxable, and so the available means of supporting the public necessities easily to be obtained.

In the South personal property is comparatively scarce, hardly to be found, and but a small amount to be taxed. Real estate has to submit to the chief burden of taxation, and real estate is depreciating as a rule rather than increasing in value. There are localities to be sure where Northern capital has planted itself, where railroads are being constructed by Northern capital, exempt, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] said yesterday, from taxation, not available for the means of the education of the people as yet. Real estate is depreciating, the very last source of getting ready money, because you can not sell that to raise the money to pay the taxes, which is the main resource they have upon which to exist. I do not speak of limited localities; I speak of that portion of our country as a whole as its condition is revealed to us in the light of the figures of the census.

Now, a country devastated by war must supply itself with dwellings, with roads and bridges, with public structures, and everything that is necessary first to exist. A man must eat before he can read; he must supply himself with food and clothing and shelter before he is able to educate himself or his children either in the common school or the university. It is just so with the Southern people. They are obliged to-day to apply their revenues more largely, from such taxation as they can submit to, first to these primary necessities and what they have left over they apply to the schools. Their relative capacity by the figures of the census to bear taxation would seem to be indicated by the valuation, and yet that would not be the truth in regard to their relative capacities to bear taxation for the purpose of maintaining schools, because schools have to be deferred to the necessities of life, as I said before. What is true of an individual is true of an aggregation of individuals; that is to say, of society as a whole.

We come back to the point, what shall be the proper measure of distribution as between the States? The actual illiteracy as shown by the census was adopted as the only available practicable basis of the computation of distribution, and I do not know of anybody who finds any fault with that. In the number of illiterates is included, of course, all over the school age who can not read or write, as well as those who are within the school age who can not read or write. They are a portion of the illiterates, and combined with those who can not read or write between ten years and twenty-one, the aggregate is made up of the entire illiterate population of the whole country. That is the basis of distribution, and it is according to it that you get the money to the State; but when you get into the State how is the money to be used? Here is the vital question to which I ask the attention of Senators who are interested in the matter at all.

The money is in the State; it goes there by virtue of a rule of distribution which is the best we can find, but is it to be applied to the very individuals who have been counted in making up this basis of distribution? Are we to take the illiterate of twenty-one, twenty-five, forty, seventy-five, one hundred years of age and undertake to educate him in the common school? Manifestly that is impracticable. As a measure of necessity it is well that they should be included, for it is the best we can take; but when we come to the application of the fund in the State itself it becomes an impossibility at once. Anybody sees that. I do not allude to any distinctions of color here, because there are no distinctions of color in the appropriation; by a provision in the bill there shall be none. Shall we set up a distinction of color in favor of the black child when we object to our friends on the other side who take a different view of this matter setting up a like distinction in favor of the white man? No, sir; the whole theory of the bill (and any other would be anti-republican) is that there shall be no discrimination as to color.

Under what rule shall we apply the money when we come to distribute it in the State? Is there any other than this: That from the combination of the fund that we give with the appropriation of the State herself all the children throughout the State of school age shall receive a like sum, or a sum which shall produce an equality of privilege? It may be that in some localities one dollar will buy more of education than it will in others, but the whole sum which goes to the State shall be used economically and wisely, so as to give to all children of school age, irrespective of and without distinction of color, an equality of common-school education.

Can there be any other wiser, more just rule of distribution than that, and can there be any other possible? Consider how it is. This country is not all through alike. The necessity is greater in some portions than in others. The States are not all through alike. There is more of living education in one part of Georgia than in another. Some portions of Georgia are in comparatively slight if in any want of assistance from the public Treasury, and in other portions of that State the money would go to the white child, rather than to the colored child, very likely; and so it may be generally thoughout the South. I do not know how that may be. I do not think it will be so to any extent—at least if we can trust the testimony of those who do know—I do not know that it is to such an extent as some of us would naturally apprehend who have the sympathy and feelings of Northern men; but assuming that it is so, what does the bill provide?

It provides that, however they appropriate their own funds, discriminating if they see fit, if they do discriminate, this national money shall so go as to produce an equality of schooling, and the colored boy shall get not quite as much but twenty times as much in any locality if it be necessary in order to give him as good a chance as his white brother has; and if at the end of one year it does not appear to have been done, it is in the power of Congress to withhold further appropriations. That is the theory of the bill.

It has been claimed by some that by reason of the fact that the colored man is more generally illiterate and enters more largely in proportion to entire numbers in the ratio of distribution in the States, therefore his child should have a larger proportion of this money. That would be true if he is discriminated against, and the bill provides that the money shall be all used for colored children if it be necessary to give colored children as good a chance as the white children have. In other words, the money is all to be expended as one sum from whatever source it comes, whether from the nation or from the State, and the State gives an account of the way it is divided, and if she does show a discrimination as to color, then she has no right to a further contribution or appropriation under the bill. There can not be any theory any more just, it seems to me, than that. These remarks apply to the moneys expended for instruction. The bill provides that the State shall herself furnish the necessary funds for the erection of houses, and the appropriations under this act go to the actual running expenses of the schools.

We ought not to ask for a discrimination when we deny to others the right to make it. This is said very largely in reply to an article from Judge Tourgee, who is a strong friend of national aid to education, a man of great ability who has written a work on the subject, but who, notwithstanding that, finds it necessary in a newspaper article, which I find has been distributed very generally among Senators, to criticise this bill and myself as one who is interested in it with some acrimony and I think with some injustice and lack of proper thought upon all the difficulties of the situation. The bill is capable, I imagine, of defense against such assaults. If we had nothing to do but to write just what we want we could suit ourselves. But we have to choose between such a bill as can become a law and the continued sacrifice of the American child. All sections and all parties must yield something if anything is to be done and we are to repair the wrongful neglect of the last twenty years.

Now, sir, let us look at this a little further. I say that it is of more consequence to the black child that the white child shall be educated than it is that his black associate shall be educated. Whence came the outrages which we call the ku-klux outrages during the period of reconstruction? Who perpetrated them upon the negro? Was it the educated white man? No, but it was his instrument, the ignorant and degraded white man. It is his child that the child of the negro must live with for all future time; for, whether it be for better or for worse, the destiny of these people is one. It is as impossible to think of eliminating the colored element from the population of this country as it is to segregate the waters of the flowing Mississippi river or of the great oceans of the world. They are there, and they will stay there; and while the white man must live with the colored man, the colored man must live with the white man, and we are undertaking to-day so to legislate as to establish an equality of condition between them. The reason why the colored man has suffered in association with the white population is because the white population is ignorant, because the influences which brought on the war still to some extent dominate over that white population.

The only way they can be removed is by the effect of universal education, and it is more important for the black child that his two white brothers be educated, be refined by a higher form of civilization, be taught to respect his rights, than it is that his own colored brother shall receive the bounty of the nation and the consequent benefits of the common schools.

We but half perceive our duty when we say we discharge it by educating the colored man. We fail in our purpose, we are in hostility to his true interests when we say we will assume his education and let the white child remain as he is, if the Southern white population see fit that he shall do so. If the sentiments of the honorable Senator from Alabama are to prevail, if the common school is a "wild and agrarian" institution, and society is to frown upon the white child, he stands no good chance of receiving an education from the people of the South themselves. Thank God, the Senator does not represent the people of the South.

Suppose we carry the idea a little further and undertake by appropriations to educate the colored man; we say we will give him enough to take care of him in school for eight years, and you white folks take care of yourselves and your own children. The colored men possess not over $5 per capita in taxable property to-day. In the next decade they will not accumulate an average of more than $200 per family, and a family which has not more than that amount of property has as a rule no homestead except it may be as a lessee. They have no power to submit to taxation for the establishment of the institutions which are indispensable to their own good, and at the end of eight years the colored people down there, if they are cast upon their own resources wholly with reference to education, will be without ability much further to educate themselves.

Meanwhile we shall have said to the South, "We propose to assume the duty, as it is a duty, to educate those colored men for eight years. You put your money into the education of your own children; the colored man is our ward; we will take care of him." At the end of eight years we draw away our support from the colored man and he is as dependent as ever; meanwhile we shall have educated the Southern white people by our own example and our own precept in the idea that they are not responsible for their colored brother, but that the nation is, and we shall have made him a permanent ward of the nation as the Indian is, and more dependent upon the nation for help.

Any common-school bill which undertakes to separate these two races from each other when by the ordinance of God they must live together and to manage the one as an element independent of the other is a delusion and a snare. We can not do it. The bill had better fail. I should like to see this bill pass, but I do not want to see any permanent injury inflicted upon my country in the attempt to accomplish a good. No, sir, we can not establish that discrimination in regard to color when we deny to those who think differently from us the right to make the same. The bill wisely provides in the tenth section that the moneys given under the provisions of this act shall be appropriated and used for the maintenance of the common schools and shall be so distributed in the several districts of the States and Territories wherein the fund is expended as to secure an equalization of schooling privileges to every child irrespective of race or color. I wish the precise words of the section itself to go into the RECORD. The language is:

That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools, not sectarian in character, in the school districts of the several States and Territories, in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child, without distinction of race or color, an equal opportunity for education.

The presiding officer for the time being (Mr. HARRISON in the chair) will recognize that as his own language, some of it, at least.

I am sorry that I do not see present in the Chamber at this time the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I should be glad if he were present, but, as he is absent, I call to the attention of the Senate this extract, which I read from the Sunday Herald of this city:

Senator Hawley administers a damaging blow to the Blair educational bill, with its $77,000,000 appropriation attached. The blow is none the less telling because it appears in the Senator's newspaper, the Hartford Courant, the organ of the Connecticut Republicans. The money is to be distributed under the provisions of the bill in proportion to illiteracy, and this is the result figured up by the Senator's newspaper:

"If two States get each, say, the same large slice on the first year, and if one State squanders the money and teaches nobody, and the other State really does encourage education and begins the good work of instructing, then at the second distribution the State which has begun the good work will get less money to carry it on with, while the State which has gone backward will get even more than at first. This is simply paying a premium for delay, malfeasance, and neglect of work. The less got for the money the more money to be got for that."

Then the editor of the Herald goes on to say that "there is something radically wrong about a bill under which such results are possible." Really one would think so if it is true. If true, this would indeed be a "damaging blow" from the Senator from Connecticut. I wish he were present that he could make the explanation. I can not believe that he is responsible for the article in the paper. If he is, it is written under a very great misapprehension as to the provisions of the bill. There is nothing of the kind in the bill, and any one who says there is anything of this sort in the bill I wish would point out the section and the clause wherein it is to be found. The bill expressly provides on that point, as the Senator knows, for he must have read it. I do not undertake to hold him responsible for the utterances of this paper because I do not know that he has any connection with it. I only call attention to it because it goes to the public as though it were Senator HAWLEY who was misrepresenting the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. This is the first time I have heard an intelligent gentleman express the opinion that I am responsible for every paragraph in a paper about 350 miles off, that I have not written a word for in many months.

Mr. BLAIR. I have not said that——

Mr. HAWLEY. Allow me a moment. Its general character and purposes I am in a sense responsible for, because my views harmonize with their and theirs with mine; but particular expressions and arguments, &c., I have no more to do with than the Senator has with some little matters around his barn in New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I am more than gratified at the disclaimer of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am probably worse opposed to the bill than my paper is.

Mr. BLAIR. I can understand that, and the Senator has a right to oppose the bill in that way; as an honorable man he is entitled to oppose it; and yet this goes to the people of the country through a paper that they generally understand to give utterance to his sentiments, and other papers quote it as a "damaging blow" from the Senator. Now that the Senator has made a disclaimer which is consonant with truth and with honor, I have no more to say about it. The bill has been misrepresented in many directions; sometimes honestly, perhaps always so; but for the benefit of those who may have been misled by this utterance I wish to say that the bill expressly provides that in case of any malappropriation by any State it shall receive no further appropriation until it has made good the deficiency, so that if it is possible for the terms of a bill to be well guarded they would seem to be in this case.

An article was sent to me in order to make me feel happy, I suppose, from the New York Star, said to be written by an eminent constitutional lawyer, in which the writer says that the constitutional argument, at least the one that I made, in support of the bill, is a droll one. It is a pretty good one, and if it affords anybody any amusement, that is all right. The article has been circulated evidently, because I think the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] made its ideas the basis of his reply to the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. I observe that it is signed "G. T. C.," from which I infer, as somebody stated, it was produced by an eminent Democratic lawyer.

I wish only to say in reply that whoever reads the article will find that the proposition which he sets up in reply to the constitutional argument in support of the bill is that it is not necessary that people shall be educated in order to be sufficiently intelligent to discharge the duties of citizenship. He goes on to say that we all know that Tom, Dick, and Harry get along very well and make money although they can not sign their names, but have to make a mark and all that sort of thing. That is the spirit of the article. If we are laboring under a mistake, and if our fathers were laboring under a mistake when they asserted that the general intelligence of the people is necessary to perpetuate the republican form of government, then the writer is correct; but the fact comes to us that intelligence is a necessity, and the national Constitution provides for the existence of a national government republican in form, and it thereby provides for general intelligence. If, I say, he is right in his proposition that intelligence is not necessary, then those who hold the contrary are wrong and the argument falls; but it is necessary, like the Senator from Alabama, to resort to a warfare upon common schools in order to make out the proposition that this bill is unconstitutional.

I have here a mass of matter from very intelligent Southern gentlemen, evidently so, in the higher walks of life, patriots, educated citizens, which I should be glad to give the Senate as bearing upon the question whether the Southern people to-day are anxious for the passage of the bill. I am held to pretty strict rules about having matter printed without being read, and if I am liable to be trespassing upon the indulgence of the Senate in asking to have what might be a column and a half in the RECORD printed I will not do so. [A pause.] I will assume that there is no objection, and that I may put in a little of this matter to save the time of the Senate so as to call the attention of those to it who may look at the RECORD to-morrow:

DALLAS, TEX., November 17, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Senator MORGAN and his following do not I assure you, "in all truth and soberness," express the feeling of the people of the South upon your educational bill, nor of one-eighth of them. You will find in the inclosed editorial of the New Orleans Times-Democrat a truthful expression of that opinion. The opposition to it here, as elsewhere, is found in a very narrow tangent of free-traders, and for the reason that to the extent that bill would disburse Government money to that extent would import duties be necessary.

Were the millions of public funds annually squandered upon rivers and harbors expended upon educating the people what an enlightened nation would this be in a few years! Are you sure that even Congressmen have opened their eyes upon the grand fact railways have well-nigh nullified water transportation? Twenty years ago there were thirty steamboats upon Western rivers to one now. Save for the accommodation and uses of vessels plying to foreign ports our harbors have become nearly useless.

I once laughed at the definition of water by an old toper: "It was created for the purpose of making crops and weakening whisky." I have learned to take it more seriously.

Please accept this as a hearty indorsement of your measure by a Jeffersonian Democrat. The perpetuity of the Union is in the education of the people.

Yours, respectfully,

H. C. STEVENSON.

Senator BLAIR, Washington.

[Editorial referred to in the foregoing letter.]

THE BLAIR EDUCATIONAL BILL.

The argument of Senator MORGAN, of Alabama, on the Blair educational bill is a narrow view of the subject that has called forth little applause or approval in the South. Mr. MORGAN is one of those strict constructionists who haul in the Constitution against every public measure of advantage proposed; who consider its principal purpose is to prevent any good act being done by the Government. Under their view the rivers and harbors of the country can not be improved; must remain forever closed to commerce, leaving the people of the interior without access to market, because a strict or rather forced construction of the Constitution prevents it. It is useless to appeal to them to show that commerce requires this, that the whole people will be benefited. No appeal of any kind can move these gentlemen, who find the Constitution opposed to the best interests of the people; an obstacle to every act of improvement, to every advantage or benefit.

In this educational matter, the opposition made to this tender of assistance that will wipe away the greatest incubus to the South, illiteracy, is far less excusable than opposition to river or harbor improvement. Mr. MORGAN, when he speaks of the virtue and happiness of the people of the backwoods, is not speaking for the Southern people if he means by this that they prefer illiteracy, believe that "ignorance is bliss," and would welcome the condition of civilization prevailing in Greenland and the interior of Africa, where people are contented because they know no better. The South is as earnest and warm an advocate of education as any section of the country. The most eminent educators who have visited it say that it is more aroused on this point than any other, and fully appreciating the evils flowing from illiteracy, it is willing to do anything in its power to crush it out.

Here the difficulties come in, difficulties created by war, bad government, and by this illiteracy itself. The South is not in a financial condition to educate all its illiterates. Most of the Southern States have made extraordinary efforts in this direction, have taxed themselves heavily to maintain their schools, more heavily, in proportion to wealth, than even New England, but experience shows that it is impossible to make any but the slightest impression upon the great mass of illiteracy. The Southern States at best can but take care of some of the youth growing up and prevent an increase in illiteracy. Nothing whatever is being done toward redeeming the adult illiterates. The most optimistic of the Southern educators can not hope under the exciting condition of affairs to make much impression on these. The wealth of the South—which under unfavorable educational conditions advances far slower than it otherwise would—will not for many years be great enough to provide for the millions who can not read and write. We see it doomed to this dark future for half a century to come. Manufactures languish, for they can never thrive except with education, as the illiterate is never a good workman or mechanic; and even agriculture is backward and slow, as it must always be when the laborer is absolutely illiterate, and thousands of the small farmers are unable to learn the progress and advance the world is making in farming.

Nothing but outside aid and assistance will prevent this, will give us hope for the future. We recognize the benefits that have accrued from the generosity of philanthropists both North and South; but these donations, although generous, have been as a drop in the bucket, so small compared with the herculean task ahead that, even with their assistance, this half century of blackness and illiteracy ahead will be reduced but a very few years. In this almost hopeless educational condition there comes to us the very aid and assistance we need in the Blair bill.

This measure might be called a bill to destroy illiteracy in the South. It is a generous offer on the part of the North to assist us in our present dilemma, and can not be refused unless we believe that there is some virtue in illiteracy. It contains two excellent provisions—first, dividing the appropriation, not in accordance with population but by illiteracy; secondly, in stimulating the Southern States to vote liberal appropriations for their public schools, the assistance of the National Government being based on the idea that these States are in favor of education and willing to pay for it.

Does it not sound like the height of madness to refuse such an offer, such an opportunity as this, by calling up that skeleton of a strict construction of the Constitution which confronts and opposes every project of national benefit and improvement. We do not believe that Senator MORGAN has the support of his own State or any other portion of the South in his opposition to this project of national aid to education. If Congress has the right to improve our rivers, if it can protect us from epidemics, has it not the right, is it not its duty to save and protect us from the most dangerous enemy our Constitution and our civilization is threatened with—ignorance, illiteracy?—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

NEWBERRY COURT HOUSE, S. C., January 8, 1886.

HONORED SIR: Accept from a true daughter of Carolina her heartfelt gratitude for your earnest and persistent efforts in pressing upon the attention of Congress your educational bill, and most sincerely do I pray for your success.

At the request of our State superintendent of education, Colonel Coward, I presented a petition to the citizens of this town for their signatures, asking Federal aid to public schools. My petition was filled from the banker to the baker. The list was complete. I sent it to Col. D. Wyatt Aiken during the session of Congress, and he answered that he placed it on file, but gave cold comfort regarding the measure. I fear he is not in accord with popular education, and trust he will not be placed in a position where his influence will militate against the Blair bill.

We are poor, notwithstanding our solons' pride and prejudice, and we need help even more than our colored people, who are greatly assisted by societies and Northern friends in all educational work. I am perfectly willing that this should be so, and while they also reap a harvest of benefits from Federal aid, we, the white and needy, may also glean the fields of learning.

I am greatly interested in the common-school system of our State, and have used voice and pen in its advancement and betterment, but though taxes are paid and all efforts made to sustain the schools, we are unable to keep them open but for a little time; hence my desire to see your bill safely through, for with this great aid we can then see our way clear.

Pray pardon the liberty of this communication, but I can not refrain from showing you that the great wish of all true friends of progress and enlightening influences are with you in this struggle for the masses, notwithstanding pedagogue or politician, and the people pray for your success and their relief.

With sentiments of high esteem, I am, yours, in sympathy,

MRS. MARY A. EVANS.

Senator BLAIR, Washington, D. C.

NEWBERRY, S. C., January 15, 1886.

HONORED SIR: Accept my sincere thanks for your kind and courteous letter of 12th instant, and, believe me, the hope therein expressed—that the school bill may pass the House this session of Congress—finds an echo in my heart and that of many thousands in South Carolina.

This subject has been discussed in all its phases by press and politicians—its constitutionality, its expediency, &c. The former is a question upon which individual opinions differ, and is one of little value. Sufficient to say, that minds of great judicial acumen have no doubt about its constitutionality. With universal suffrage it becomes us of the South as a body-politic to watch that cancer, illiteracy. Only an intelligent people remains a free people, and that which lessens illiteracy, wherever done, accrues to the good of all.

The school system of South Carolina is as good as any other, but we need money to make it a success. We pay a large tax in proportion to income, yet the amount is inadequate to meet the demand. It is the duty of the Government to help us educate the colored man from an overflowing Treasury. We are poor; the war dealt hardly with us. Lands were devastated, homes destroyed, debt, like Damocles's sword, hanging over our citizens' heads, public-school funds all gone; yet South Carolina bravely put her shoulder to the wheel and began the struggle to educate an illiterate generation and a letterless race. But the burden is too heavy and we call for help. It has been heard. Will it be heeded? It is not a matter of charity that the South and the negro ask. It is a claim founded on justice to us and due the negro by the nation, else he must be left in the darkness of an ignorance only less abject than his former condition.

Will Congress heed this call for help? The necessity of the South has aroused public sentiment on this vital question of educating the masses. Will the nation turn aside her ears to the oily politicians, who, knowing that ignorance hoisted them into position, would fain keep the shackels of ignorance on a free people by putting aside this subject year after year? Let wily men take heed. Necessity laughs at constitutions and threatens if not heard.

Through the medium of the press public opinion has been molded to a great extent to the proper understanding of the Blair bill. The fears of the people, who have just escaped from radical rule, was aroused by wrong-headed men; but when it was understood that the funds for educational purposes would be made supplementary to the State school funds objection vanished like mist before the sun. In my own town one hundred and twenty names of prominent citizens were signed to a petition asking national aid to education. This in the face of a pronounced opinion that not three could be found to sign it. During the session of the South Carolina Legislature a bitter fight was waged against free tuition in the South Carolina University by a few would-be solons who imagine they represent the people. The bill was defeated by a 3 to 1 vote, and the yell of delight which burst forth from the sympathetic spectators and students awoke from their Rip Van Winkle sleep of twenty years the wise men who would stop the wheels of progress, and taught them that old ideas had grown obsolete and new laws are required to meet the exigencies of advancing civilization.

That gallant son of South Carolina, WADE HAMPTON, who was as unflinching in battle as he is unswerving in principle, recognized this fact from the very beginning, and none dare doubt his loyalty to his State because he asks of the nation aid to assist in educating the poor of the South.

You have my authority to use, if you choose, in debate or elsewhere, anything I may write. I have no fear of successful contradiction relative to this subject. I am to the manner born, a South Carolinian by birth and principle. All I own and all I love are here. I have shared the sorrows of my beloved State and I now rejoice in her redemption from misrule, and believe that aid to assist her in her struggle with the problem of which you can form but a faint idea from your standpoint will solve the matter to the nation's satisfaction.

The new South, with new ideas and leaders of progress who will bring their party into harmony with the progressive tendencies of the people, has risen from her ashes, and among the names on this roll of honor will be found South Carolina.

With high esteem, yours,

MARY A. EVANS.

Senator BLAIR, Washington, D. C.

ROCKY POINT, N. C., February 20, 1886.

DEAR SIR: You are entirely correct in declaring upon the floor of the Senate that the people of the Southern States are in favor of the Blair educational bill. It is more warmly and universally popular in the South than any motion that has been before Congress since the late war. The tide rises higher and higher, stronger and stronger, the more it is understood, and now threatens to overwhelm, in its onward and upward course, any public servant or public man who opposes this grand measure of deliverance of our Southern people from the burdens and dangers of ignorance. In our State the question rises above party politics, and all parties favor it. Our Legislature indorsed it a year ago by nearly a unanimous vote. The people demanded this expression, and since then the great measure has a stronger support than ever before. Of course there are some old fogies and mummies in this State, as there are in all the Southern States, who oppose this as they do every measure of progress and of development and recuperation, but they are of that deluded, impracticable, obsolete class who are passing away, and are being swallowed up by the onward, upward, sweeping demands and necessities of the times. Please do not tire nor relax your able efforts until your bill has triumphantly passed both Houses of Congress and become a law.

Yours, truly,

S. S. SATCHWELL, M. D.

Hon. H. W. BLAIR,
United States Senate.

NEWBERRY, S. C., February 17, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I would be under great obligation to you for a copy of your educational bill, together with a copy of your address in explanation of it. I am a warm advocate of the measure—have defended it in the press in the past and wish to do so again. I therefore desire to have the bill before me. I am quite disgusted at so much opposition to it on the part of Southern Congressmen, and can not but suspect that a very considerable part of this is from opposition to the education of the colored people at all. The deplorable state of ignorance prevailing in a large part of the South, among whites as well as negroes, can hardly be exaggerated, Senator MORGAN to the contrary notwithstanding. Our only hope for improvement depends on the public schools; but these, to a very large extent, are extremely inefficient, with little hope of improvement for want of means. Your bill offers us a partial remedy, at least, and I trust the prospect of its passage is good.

Very respectfully,

B. O. DUNCAN.

Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR,
United States Senate, Washington.

GREENSBOROUGH, ALA., February 10, 1886.

Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR,
Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: With the hope that you will treat this letter in the same spirit with which it is written, the writer in his most humble condition in life presumes to drop you a few lines, as he thinks, of encouragement.

In the black belt of Alabama, far from you, the cries and prayers of a few, yes few, made few by the vast clouds of ignorance, are ascending to high Heaven asking the one Father, the one God, to assist you in your noble work.

I thank God that you have the assistance of one of the noblest sons of Alabama, Hon. JAMES L. PUGH. If he continues to assist in this noble work he will receive the plaudits of the best people of Alabama.

There is too much ignorance in this land, Constitution or no Constitution; this cloud which is threatening our institutions must be swept away.

Senator, stop for a moment. Look at the black belt of Alabama. Ignorant and poor American citizens possessed with that they can not use—the ballot. If they could, I fear the safety of the country, and yet I am colored. What must be done? We must be educated! Who is to do it? We are not able. The resources of the State are not sufficient. Private contributions will not suffice. The General Government must, as in duty bound it ought to, educate us. We need it and we look only to such public spirited men as you to get it for us. We have no tribute to lay at your feet; we only ask God to bless you.

Right in this town we are in need of a new school-house, and we have not the money to build it. Our school is only seven months, and that, too, with an insufficient number of teachers. Need any one any more proof? If so, let them come into this country, see for themselves, then your labor will be light.

I pray for your success.

Yours, respectfully.

I withhold the name at the request of the writer.

[Editorial from the Birmingham Age, Birmingham, Ala., Saturday, February 13, 1886.]

SENATOR MORGAN ON EDUCATION.

Whatever may be said of Senator MORGAN and his views on the Blair education bill, it must be admitted his speech on Thursday against the bill was an able presentation of his side of the question.

The distinguished Senator does not antagonize the bill this time altogether on the ground of its unconstitutionality, but he lays down the broad principle that the Government has no right to tax one man to educate the children of another man; not only this, but the Senator intimated that the best people in the United States were uneducated backwoodsmen. He did not say it in so many words, but we are bound to infer from the press reports of his speech that the Senator doubts the wisdom of educating the masses of the people.

If this is the Senator's position, and the Age trusts it has not misinterpreted him as much as it regrets his position, he may at least have the consolation of knowing that he is in such good company as the philosopher, Herbert Spencer, and the economist, Bastiat—a school of thinkers who limit government strictly to the administration of justice. But the Senator is not only antagonizing the accepted policy of the American people as declared in their State constitutions and statute-books, but in opposing this bill he is also antagonizing the will of the great majority of the people of his own State and that of the people of the United States. Popular education may be wrong; the best and happiest people may be those who live in the backwoods; but the great body of the American people think otherwise, and they will not tolerate such views. It is too late to attempt to undo what has already been done by the National Government and the State governments for the cause of popular education, and all talk in this direction is a mere idle waste of time and talent.

The Senator's chief ground of objection to the Blair bill is, as he conceives it, its unconstitutionality. We would like to know of the distinguished Senator upon what ground he can justify the giving away of 78,659,439 acres of the public lands by the Federal Government for educational purposes, and wherein consists the difference in giving money and giving lands which are to be converted into money. We would also like to know by what constitutional authority the United States made an appropriation for the building of the West Point and Annapolis Academies, and annually appropriates money for their support. We know the Senator makes a broad distinction between moneys derived from taxation and moneys derived from the sales of public lands, but no special fund from the sales of lands is set aside for the support of these institutions. The money is appropriated from the general funds derived from taxation, if we are not greatly mistaken. If it is constitutional to appropriate money for the education of soldiers and sailors why is it not also constitutional to appropriate money to educate citizens, voters?

And what about the surplus the Federal Government in 1836 divided out among the States, most of which as in Alabama has been devoted to school purposes? If Senator MORGAN is right the State had no authority to use this fund for educational purposes.

But why argue the question with the distinguished Senator when he strikes at the very foundation of the common-school system of the country. If he does not believe the Federal Government has the right to appropriate money derived from taxation to school purposes, for precisely the same reason he denies the right of the State to do the same thing. The Senator does not believe it right to vote away the money of one man to educate the child of another man. By parity of reasoning the Senator must also say he does not believe the country has the right to take the taxes of the citizen living in its northern end to help build a bridge for the citizen living in its southern end, a part of the country which the north countryman never travels and never expects to; and that the Federal Government has no right to take the taxes paid by the citizens of California to help improve the Tennessee River, a river which thousands of them never will see nor derive any direct benefit from.

Senator MORGAN is perfectly sincere in his views on public education, but he is a century and a half behind the age in which he lives.

[From the Philadelphia American, February 20, 1886.]

WEEKLY NOTES.

A Friend (in the double sense in which the word is commonly used in Philadelphia) has shown us a private letter from a young Southern girl who was recently here to educate herself for a teacher, and who is now in charge of a school in one of the States south of Virginia. In the course of it she says:

"I am teaching a public school of seventy scholars. Fifty are now coming; the others will come perhaps. Our public schools are so sorry! We can have no money to pay an assistant. The free school is cut down to two months. It does such little good that we are discouraged to see no other school but it. We have a right good school-house for this part of the country. Three Friends have worked till the house is ready to teach in, but they can not pay a teacher by themselves. There are one hundred children that might be in school, but not half of them can pay. Some of the parents are widow women, and have nothing to buy books. Does thee know of any fund or individual who might aid us to get books, or to pay for those who can't pay their tuition. It's a good neighborhood, but people do not lay by anything for school purposes because they know not the good of education * * * The colored people don't run their school in winter, as they can't get clothes to wear."

* * * * * * *

This simple picture, drawn without art, and not intended for any but private reading, is, it must be confessed, very sorry. The locality she describes is an upland county, and the conditions of life there are not so prosperous that much could be spared for education; but yet it is evident that better work than this will have to be done if the new South is to rescued from the grasp of illiteracy, and the conviction must be newly enforced that there must be aid from the national hand. Perhaps there never was in all history a more absurd and unreasonable situation than this in the United States in reference to Southern education. It reminds one as nearly as possible of the Spanish king, who roasted before his own palace fire, because, though plenty of grandees were standing about his chair, the one designated by the court etiquette to withdraw him was unfortunately absent. Here is the great need of school work; here is the weakness of the local and State funds; and here, too, is the abundant strength of the national Treasury. Yet it seems to be the idea of some people that the court etiquette forbids the nation to help the States, even under such circumstances!

AMITE CITY, LA., February 12, 1886.

DEAR SIR: * * * Born and reared in Virginia, having spent near a half century in Mississippi and Louisiana, and been a participant in many of the important events of the past, I can fully understand and comprehend the importance of your "educational bill," and without any stretch of fancy can see the social and political advantages that would flow from its adoption. Let the Government extend its fostering hand to raise the people from an ignorant to an intelligent existence, and not only will the happiness of the people be assured, but the bands that unite the different sections will be strengthened and the prosperity and advancement of the nation be placed upon a sure foundation.

* * * * * * *

Yours, most respectfully,

WM. H. GARLAND.

Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR,
United States Senate, Washington.

[Extracts from an address delivered by Col. William H. Garland before the Educational Society of Tangipahoa Parish, Louisiana, on January 30, 1886.]

The number of voters in this judicial district, and the number that can not write, arranged by parishes and color.

Parishes.	White.	Colored.	Total.	White.		Colored.		Total.
				Write.	Make mark.	Write.	Make mark.	Write.	Make mark.
Washington	638	253	891	446	192	38	215	484	407
Saint Tammany	815	558	1,373	613	202	138	420	751	623
Livingston	860	187	1,047	671	189	19	168	690	357
Tangipahoa	1,291	784	2,075	1,094	197	80	704	1,174	901

By these figures the grave and important fact is set forth that, of the male population of the State over twenty-one years of age, 49.7 per cent., or nearly one-half, can not write, and that in this judicial district 43 per cent. of the voters can not write. In contemplating these facts the mind shudders at the danger that surrounds us; for history shows that ignorance and vice are twin sisters. In England, in 1872, out of 147,073 commitments for crime, 49,345 could neither read nor write, 92,123 could read and write imperfectly, 4,892 could read and write well, and but 223 had received a good education. The statistics of the city of New York show that nearly one-half of the expenses of the city are incurred on account of crime. In New Orleans, in 1885, there were 17,435 arrests made by the police; of these there were 11,161 who could read and write, and 6,274, or over one-third who could not read or write, and the statistics of every country show similar facts.

With the knowledge gathered from the experience of the past, that in every age and clime the vicious and unprincipled man is ever playing upon the passions and credulity of the ignorant, it becomes the duty of every one who loves his country, who desires the improvement of his race, and seeks his own safety and happiness, to put forth his whole energy to fit the people for an intelligent performance of their duty. The verdict of the civilized world is that this can best be done by a wise and judicious system of public education. Pressed down by the results of the late war, the Southern people have not been able to carry out the necessary measures for the education of the people which their judgment and feelings prompted; but with returning prosperity the necessity of educating the masses is pressing itself on the public attention, and this society is organized to aid in building up a public sentiment that shall demand of every legislative body that it shall lend its aid in breaking the chains of ignorance and fitting every man for an intelligent discharge of his whole duty.

The day has passed when men can fold their arms and stand idly by, the time has come when each one must mingle his voice with his fellow-man's, to demand that every legislative body must do its whole duty. That the police juries should be reminded that they are the local legislatures of the parishes, that their duties are not bounded to the preservation of roads and bridges, and the payment of jurors and the feeding of prisoners; that a broader, a higher duty is theirs; that the improvement and happiness of the rising generation is theirs; that the high road to knowledge and virtue should be opened to every child. Oh! how sad grows the heart when it reflects that in the past year, in this parish, $1,900 was levied to pay the expenses of juries and $873.45 was paid for feeding prisoners, while but $500 was appropriated towards educating over three thousand children of the parish, and that, for the present year, as yet no appropriation has been made.

The neglect to meet the duty to the children of the parish is not so much the fault of the police jury as it is of the people themselves. A cry should go up from every fireside in the parish, and demand of the police jury, the local legislature of the parish, an appropriation that would aid in building up an efficient system of public education. Let this public sentiment gather strength from day to day, until it knocks at your State and national legislative halls, and demands from them that which every child in the land has a right to—an education that will fit him for an intelligent discharge of his duties to his fellow-man, his country, and his God.

Will you enlist in a cause so glorious? Will you gather around your country's altar, and give a portion of your time to rousing the public mind to the necessity of energetic action in so important a work? I plead with you, not for myself, for ere the seed of the "Blair bill" shall have bloomed and blossomed the tongue that now seeks to rouse you to action will be still and silent, but I plead with you for my country and for my country's children.

It is equally for the rich man's child as for the poor man's child that I invoke your aid. Build up your public schools and thus break down the prejudice of the rich and elevate the thoughts and aspirations of the poor. Hold high the torch that lights the way to knowledge and to virtue; drive back ignorance and vice to the dark caverns, and let them no longer hold the hearts and minds of the people in chains and bondage. Man's destiny is the skies; a golden chain links his soul with a high and noble destiny, but to keep that chain bright and strong it is necessary that all the faculties with which God has endowed him should be fully developed. Let his animal passions run wild and unrestrained, first one vice will attach itself to this golden chain, then another and then another until their accumulated weight snaps the chain and the soul sinks, sinks in the dark pit of endless misery! Then when the wailing cry of anguish shall come up from that dark pit, with what trembling anxiety will your hearts inquire, "The wailing of whose child is that?"

"Why thus sinks his soul in wretchedness and misery?" Then to your stricken heart will come the answer. It is because the light of knowledge has never wakened his mind to thought and action; it is because the yearnings of his soul were never pointed to the life beyond the skies. When this fleeting life shall have ended, and the spirit walks the court of heaven, and the book of life is opened, and Almighty God shall demand of you, "where are the jewels I gave you in trust" oh, may you not have to answer "they are broken to pieces, they are trampled in dust."

Rouse then yourselves to your duty, and lend your aid to build up a temple whose spires shall catch the first light of the morning, and around whose dome the glory of the setting sun shall linger as the light-house fire, to point you and your children to the path that leads to a higher a brighter existence.

The honorable Senator from Alabama, who seems to think that it is indispensable that he should kick at me every time he gets upon his feet, has received a good deal of attention from his Southern friends since he made his famous constitutional argument that common schools are a damage to the country and therefore it is unconstitutional to support them, and I should be willing to read a little while, weary as I am, and still more weary as I know the Senate is. I suppose all that sort of matter, however, is too much of a personal nature, and a man ought to get above it and stay above it, and I will dismiss it. If the bill can not pass without being settled on questions of that kind, let the bill go.

I wish to say a word to the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] who denounced this bill with a luxuriance and vehemence of rhetoric worthy of himself. That is all I can say in regard to that. I would remind him, however, of the bill that he has introduced at this very session in favor of a national university, which has incorporated in it a great many ideas that it would be well I think to extend to the maintenance of the common schools of the country. Every State is to be represented in that national university, and it is a good thing. The bill has gone to a subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor, every member of which is the peer of the Senator himself, and I hope they will very soon report it to the Senate favorably. I indorse the whole of it in its principles and much of it in its details, and I hope the bill will pass. I commend to him, however, the question whether it is not just as well on the whole to be willing to take care of the masses of society as to establish, at the vast expense which he proposes, a national university.

We have given already 80,000,000 acres of public lands to schools, agricultural colleges, and seminaries. The proceeds of those lands have gone. Of the public lands which we have given, that is the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, vast masses still remain, wisely held as they are by States for that accretion of value which comes from surrounding improvements, so that the school funds of some of the Western States where they have wisely reserved their lands from sale seem likely to be, I might say enormous in the future from the subsequent sales of those public lands. Nobody is sorry for that. I am only sorry that New Hampshire has not had her share of it, but she is glad that those who have it may keep it.

We have given 5 per cent. of the cash sales of the public lands, and that amounts now to about $9,000,000. We gave, under the act of 1836, as has been often stated, $28,000,000 for the same purpose. By a subsequent distribution in 1841 we gave almost $700,000 more. By the distribution of the $28,000,000 we gave per capita to the people of the country at that time almost $2, while the amount which we propose to give by this bill will be less than 12 cents per capita the first year. As the aggregate for eight years, considering the increase of population to come during that period, it will be not over $1.20, or an average of 15 cents yearly per capita. That is the extent of the proposed contribution under the provisions of this bill.

As I said earlier, private charity has given to the South already $25,000,000, as religious organizations compute the amount. The Peabody fund is $3,000,000, I think. I will ask the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] if that is the amount.

Mr. EVARTS. It is $2,000,000.

Mr. BLAIR. Two million dollars, the interest of which is given annually?

Mr. EVARTS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. The Slater fund is $1,000,000, the interest of which is given annually in the South. There is at least one man, recently deceased, whose private fortune would triple the whole sum which we propose to give in the course of eight years for the extinction of this terrific evil. I do not make any allusions to the munificence of gentlemen who are upon this floor, but in view of what private individuals can do and have done who should have no more vivid sense of the necessities of the hour than the rest of us possess, we, the enlightened legislators of the country, to whose care the interests of the country are confided, it does seem to me under these circumstances, ought to be willing to give this real pittance, for it is but a pittance after all, to the extinction of this great wrong and source of danger to our institutions.

I have here the voice of New England, or at least of Boston, our metropolitan city, upon this subject, being short articles from the Journal and the Traveller, which I shall take the liberty of incorporating with my remarks, if there be no objection:

NATIONAL AID TO EDUCATION.

It seems to us that the objection made in some quarters to the Blair education bill—that it puts a premium upon State inefficiency and negligence by basing the allotment upon illiteracy—is not a candid one. It is said that to give the larger part of the appropriation to States where the common schools are so inadequate that illiteracy abounds is to insure the continuance of State inefficiency, and that, in order to get a larger slice of the fund, the people of certain States will diminish rather than increase their own educational endeavors. We do not apprehend any danger of this sort. We have not so poor an opinion of any State in this Union as to believe that its people would deliberately cultivate illiteracy and diminish educational influences in order that a few thousand dollars more might be drawn from the national Treasury.

Moreover, these objectors apparently overlook that clause of the bill which provides that States whose appropriations for educational purposes do not reach a certain ratio of the aid to be extended from the national Treasury are to be cut off altogether from the benefits of the appropriation, as is the case also with any State which may misapply any portion of the fund.

The true way of stating the case is that illiteracy is a disease, the continuance of which menaces the well-being of the whole body-politic. National aid is the proposed remedy. If there is any better or more natural course than to apportion the remedy in ratio to the extent of the disease, we do not know what it is. The object being to rid the country of illiteracy, the rational course would seem to be to put forth the greatest exertions wherever illiteracy is greatest. It is not the States where illiteracy is small and the public school system most developed which stand in need of aid, but the States which, with more or less of well-meant endeavor, and as we believe with an increasing earnestness of purpose, are contending with long arrears of ignorance. Their task is too great for them, unassisted.

As the security of all our institutions depends ultimately upon an intelligent ballot, it is not only, in our judgment, proper that the nation should aid the States in reducing this mass of illiteracy, but it is an urgent and pressing necessity that it should do so. This is not to say that the Blair bill is an ideal measure, or that it is free from all objections, but that national aid in some form is needed, and needed at once, and that when bestowed it must be in ratio to the evil to be reached.

[Editorial from the Boston Traveller, February 18, 1886.]

THE EVIL OF ILLITERACY.

The Southern Senators who follow the lead of Senator MORGAN, of Alabama, in opposing the educational bill now before the Senate would probably not regard that measure so unconstitutional were the moneys appropriated by the bill to be expended by the local authorities of the States receiving them without restriction as to their methods of such expenditure. Beyond question the South is making great progress in the cause of education. The State and school officers, almost without an exception, state that they can do no more at present. They admit their increasing prosperity; they point, as they may well do, to the rapid increase in their school funds, amounting, as the tables show, to something over $2,000,000 since 1882; but over against these facts they call to mind the continued depression of all valuations in their midst, the long prostration of business, their want of school accommodations and of trained teachers, and, above all, the burden of illiteracy, which rests upon them, and they declare that this illiteracy can not be overcome by means of the State and local funds as rapidly as the interests of the particular States involved and of the entire nation demand.

The figures here given speak eloquently of the needs of the South, and of what must be done if the nation is to overcome one of the most deadly foes of the national life in the form of Southern illiteracy. It is hardly possible to prevent the suspicion that it is not so much a scrupulous regard for the Constitution that lies at the root of Southern opposition to national appropriation for education as it is the desire which exists in some quarters to keep the masses of the Southern people illiterate, that their votes may be the better controlled by the few. The illiterate black voter of the South has the ballot but in name. Its power is exercised by the educated white, and it has come to pass that one white Southern vote is equal to two Northern ones.

That there should be some Southern whites greedy of power who prefer that blacks should be kept illiterate is not strange, and this class is evidently represented in the United States Senate. The duty of the nation, however, is clear. Illiteracy, wherever found, is a menace to the national life, and it is simply proposed to attack and overcome this evil. The Blair bill meets with some opposition in the North as well as South, but the opponents are short-sighted, even when basing their opposition on economical grounds. True economy demands the building of the school-house and the establishment of the school, since on these the safety and perpetuity of our institutions depend.

I wish to state the actual taxation of all the States by groups of the Union, and I ask attention to these figures because they are from the census, and they contradict the assertions which have been made in this Chamber: New England, $1.58 out of every $100 of valuation; the Middle States, $1.82; the Southern States, $1.58; the Western States, $2.08 on every $100, and the Territories, $2.06 on the $100. I have explained already the reasons why for the South $1.58 on the $100 is vastly more than the same taxation in New England upon $100. We of New England can better bear the taxation of $5 per $100 than the South as a whole can bear the taxation of $1.58 on the $100 of valuation. I take another list of figures, the money raised by actual taxation of these several groups which make up the country. The following percentages are applied to the uses of schools: In the New England States of the whole amount raised by taxation 20.2 per cent. goes to the schools, or about one-fifth; in the Middle States 19½ per cent. goes to the schools; in the Southern States 20.1 goes to schools; in the Western States 26.6 goes to schools, and in the Territories 22.1 goes to schools.

I have here, and I will give to the Senate, a short calculation bearing upon the relative burdens by the cities. The Southern taxation comes from poor men and from homesteads, as there is so little floating money there and taxes are exceedingly hard to pay. Table 19 of the tables which were printed in the commencement of this discussion, shows in the calculation of cities the following: New York city, taxation $2.58 on the $100; New Orleans, $2.64 on the $100; Philadelphia, $2.05 on the $100; Nashville, $3 on the $100; Boston, $1.24 on the $100; Memphis, $1.79 on the $100; Cincinnati, $2.91 on the $100; Charleston, $3.10 on the $100; Little Rock, $3.85 on the $100, while Savannah pays $2.93 on the $100. From this table Southern taxation in the cities would seem to be higher than that in the Northern States.

The only Southern States that have increased in valuation since 1870, as shown by the census of 1880, are North Carolina, Texas, and Georgia. In North Carolina there has been an increase of $25,000,000 valuation, in Texas of $170,000,000, in Georgia of $12,000,000, making an aggregate increase in those three States of $207,000,000, while the loss in the other ten Southern States is $411,475,090. This, remember, is after the slaves had disappeared as an element of valuation in both cases, they having been liberated before the census of 1870. Take now the valuation per capita of the different groups of our country. In New England the valuation is $661 to each individual; in the Western States it is $334; in the Middle States $473; in the Territories $211, while in the Southern States it is $155.

We all understand how taxation oppresses a poor people. As I said earlier, the colored population does not average over $5 per capita of valuation, although their increase during the last decade in population is 35 per cent., some 7 or 8 per cent. more rapid than the increase of the white population in the same locality. The net loss, taking the whole of the Southern States together, in valuation during ten years is $202,868,844, while the increase in population was 4,006,982, or a net loss of 8 per cent. of valuation and an increase of 30 per cent. of population.

What I said before I find many Senators have not read, and I would have done better to have made my speech and taken two days to make it instead of allowing so much of it to be printed in hope of saving time. In that speech I have shown that at present only about one-third of the Southern school children are in school, while two-thirds of the Northern children are enrolled. The average number in attendance in both cases is much less than the number enrolled. If in the Southern States school privileges are provided to the same extent that we have them in the Northern States after having provided the plant, the school-house, and the educated teacher, it would require of this, if I recollect aright, an expenditure of over $30,000,000, after having supplied, as I say, the plant, the mills wherein to grind out education as we have done in the North. Then there should be annually expended in the South over $34,000,000 at the same ratio of expenditure which we have at the North. Their actual expenditure is only some $16,000,000 for the purpose of construction of school-houses, wages of teachers, and everything else.

Mr. President, the subject is of course interminable, and I have no right to trespass longer upon the attention of the Senate, but in conclusion I wish to say just a few words.

The bill represents the result of the effort, concession, and matured judgment of those who, with differences of opinion as to the details of it, have felt forced to agree upon some remedy for the emergency now threatening the general welfare. The bill may not be the best that inspiration would produce, but it represents the best that the Senate, a continuing body, has been able to agree upon after deep consideration in the last Congress, by a mutual compromise of conflicting views extending now from the close of the war to the present time.

Probably no great measure applicable like this to a situation so complex that all efforts at legislation would fail if at the same time that situation was not so terrible to the patriotic mind, was ever satisfactory in all its details to all its supporters; but in this case I think the Senate will have cause for congratulation that its deliberations have produced a measure which, while reasonably adequate in the remedy proposed for the evil, is not lavish, and at the same time the period over which the expenditure is to be extended is such that its operation can be arrested before great loss to the public Treasury, provided the results of the small annual expenditure should not be satisfactory.

It is a measure, sir, which, while liberal to sections, is yet as necessary to the good of the whole as for those localities where the evil is specially destructive. The national life-blood circulates in all parts of the body politic, and it matters not where the tooth of poison penetrates to its vital flow.

The nation has but one heart as it has but one destiny, and he is no American whose sympathy is bounded by the lines of his State or whose prejudices would forever dwell upon the calamities and wrongs of the past. It was Cain who denied that he was his brother's keeper, and that was six thousand years ago.

If we must refer to the past let us recall more glorious memories, and the tender associations of other days when the North and the South stood shoulder to shoulder against the mightiest earthly forces in defense of the principles of human liberty and established this great nation upon the eternal foundations of intelligence, justice, and law.

Whatever may have occurred since those earlier days to excite sectional animosity, the fact of our unity and of our common destiny is now as fixed as fate, and our future as a nation will be what we make it as a nation. What shall become of the colored race in our country is a great question. What shall become of the white race in our country is a greater question. What shall become of both races in their mutual relations is the greatest question of all. No one can answer either of the first two until he can answer the last; and neither of those questions can be answered save in recognition of the divine truth that "God hath made of one blood all the nations of the earth." There may be a happy and prosperous future for our children and for their descendants generation after generation. If so, intelligence and virtue must be universally diffused by the ministrations of religion and the sweet influences of the common school. Fifteen hundred millions of men are watching our example and their destiny waits on ours.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, so much has been said upon the measure now before the Senate, it has been so thoroughly discussed both in its constitutional aspects and in its relations to the people of the section from which I come, that I feel some hesitation now in addressing the Senate upon the subject.

The people of Mississippi, however, are interested in this measure. The house of representatives of that State, now in session, has sent a request to my colleague and myself to support the pending bill. Some things have been said during the discussion, and especially on this side of the Chamber, by those with whom I am accustomed to act and with whose views on constitutional law I am generally in accord, which seem to demand from me at least an explanation of the reasons which control me in supporting this measure.

And in the outset, Mr. President, I desire to submit that I do not appear, nor does the State of Mississippi through her Senators here appear, as a suppliant for the passage of this measure. On the contrary, the State of Mississippi and her representatives here have all along been accustomed to regard this measure and similar ones which have been offered in this body as an offering on the part of the North.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I desire at some time in this debate to put on record a very brief message of General Grant, dated the 30th of March, 1870, at the time when this movement for a grant of this kind began, communicating to Congress the adoption of the fifteenth amendment. I think it very likely that my honorable friend from Mississippi would like to have that read as a part of his argument on the very point he is making.

Mr. GEORGE. I should be very glad to have it read.

Mr. HOAR. If it is agreeable to him I will send it to the desk to be read now.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be very glad to have it read.

Mr. HOAR. It is not necessary to read the Secretary of State's communication, but only President Grant's.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It is unusual to notify the two Houses of Congress, by message, of the promulgation, by proclamation of the Secretary of State, of the ratification of a constitutional amendment. In view, however, of the vast importance of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, this day declared a part of that revered instrument, I deem a departure from the usual custom justifiable. A measure which makes at once four millions of people voters, who were heretofore declared by the highest tribunal in the land not citizens of the United States, nor eligible to become so (with the assertion that, "at the time of the Declaration of Independence, the opinion was fixed and universal in the civilized portion of the white race, regarded as an axiom in morals as well as in politics, that black men had no rights which the white man was bound to respect"), is indeed a measure of grander importance than any other one act of the kind from the foundation of our free Government to the present day.

Institutions like ours, in which all power is derived directly from the people, must depend mainly upon their intelligence, patriotism, and industry. I call the attention, therefore, of the newly-enfranchised race to the importance of their striving in every honorable manner to make themselves worthy of their new privilege. To the race more favored heretofore by our laws I would say, withhold no legal privilege of advancement to the new citizen. The framers of our Constitution firmly believed that a republican government could not endure without intelligence and education generally diffused among the people. The "Father of his Country," in his Farewell Address, uses this language: "Promote, then, as a matter of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of the Government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened." In his first annual message to Congress the same views are forcibly presented, and are again urged in his eighth message.

I repeat that the adoption of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution completes the greatest civil change, and constitutes the most important event, that has occurred since the nation came into life. The change will be beneficial in proportion to the heed that is given to the urgent recommendations of Washington. If these recommendations were important then, with a population of but a few millions, how much more important now, with a population of 40,000,000, and increasing in a rapid ratio.

I would therefore call upon Congress to take all the means within their constitutional powers to promote and encourage popular education throughout the country; and upon the people everywhere to see to it that all who possess and exercise political rights shall have the opportunity to acquire the knowledge which will make their share in the Government a blessing and not a danger. By such means only can the benefits contemplated by this amendment to the Constitution be secured.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 30, 1870.

Mr. HOAR. I simply desire to add that that message was followed by President Grant in his general message in December, 1872, just after his re-election, by an urgent recommendation of a liberal grant from the public Treasury for the common schools throughout the country.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts for making this contribution to the discussion of this question.

I was going on to say when interrupted that the State of Mississippi and her Senators are not here as suppliants for the national bounty, that we have all along regarded this measure and similar ones which have passed this body as generous offerings on the part of the Northern States to aid the Southern States in removing that very great danger which exists there now arising from the illiteracy of a portion of their people.

I find myself placed by this offer, the white people of Mississippi also find themselves placed in this condition: We have in that State a majority of about 180,000 colored people. Here is an offer made, as we understand it, by the generous people of the North to aid us in educating them. Are we to reject it? Confessedly we are unable to educate them as we ought. Then the question presents itself to us, my colleague and myself and others representing States in a similar position, are we to reject this offer? It is in that attitude alone that I will consider the question.

The views and the wishes of the people of Mississippi of all classes and of all colors have been very distinctly made known on this subject. I know of a few, and a few only, who reject this offer. I do not know of a single colored man in the State of Mississippi who does not ardently wish that this measure should pass.

When such a measure is proposed, I am bound to consider what might be the peculiar views and wishes of the colored people of the South upon the question. I represent on this floor, as I have stated, a majority of colored people. It is as much my duty to represent their interests, to promote their welfare, to advance them so far as constitutional power is vested in me to advance them, as it is to advance the interests and the welfare of the white people.

Now, sir, as I have just said, there is not, as I believe, a colored man in the State of Mississippi who is not ardently in favor of this bill; and if I should undertake to present some of the arguments which a colored man in the State of Mississippi would present in favor of the passage of this bill I would suppose that he would say something like this: That when the war ended he found himself enfranchised, made a citizen of the United States, clothed with the rights, responsibilities, and duties of citizenship; he was made a voter; he was made a part of the governmental machinery not only of the State of Mississippi but of the country at large. When these came to him he found himself utterly incapable of discharging these duties and these responsibilities. He would point to the long history of himself and his race in this country as a slave. He would say during all that time no man of my race, no man of my color, was allowed to read or write; that in all the States in which we have lived it was a part of the institution of slavery, recognized so by everybody, that the slave should not be educated. He would plead this as an excuse for his ignorance and an excuse for his incapacity to discharge the great duties and the high responsibilities which had been placed upon him by the act of the Federal Government.

Then, sir, he might truthfully say this: When the time came when he was first called upon to vote in the State of Mississippi he voted under a law which proscribed many of the most intelligent white people of that State. "In my ignorance I was warned by a law of Congress proscribing those who were disfranchised by the reconstruction laws not to consult them, and as they had opposed my enfranchisement I did not feel disposed to consult them." That being thus situated, being thus suddenly called upon to discharge the high duties of citizenship, ignorant of the constitution of the State, ignorant of the Constitution of the United States, ignorant of all statecraft, he was obliged to resort to what help he could find; he was obliged to rely upon somebody. "I found in the State of Mississippi at that time men who were strangers, men who came from that section of the country which gave me freedom. Ignorant myself, weak myself, unable to comprehend the great problems which were submitted to me for solution, I applied to them. I gave them my unreserved support. I concurred in electing to the Legislature of Mississippi and to the constitutional convention of Mississippi men who framed the constitution and who framed laws about which I knew nothing." He would then point to the history of the legislation of that State during that period and show that the taxes of that State had been raised in the course of four or five years more than 1,400 per cent.; that he was urged by his friends to go for high taxation; he was advised that if taxes were imposed upon land at a high rate the owners would be compelled to surrender it and that he would thus have an opportunity to get it. He would point to the fact, that within the short period of five years 6,500,000 acres of private property in land were sold for taxes to the State, because there were no private persons, white or colored, who were able to buy it for the taxes due on it.

He would point also to the further fact that taxes were levied for the purpose, as it was said, of educating the people of Mississippi; he would show that during that period the fund was so manipulated that only about 25 or 30 cents in the dollar actually collected from the taxpayer ever went for the purpose of education. He would point to the further fact that in his ignorance and weakness he was made a tool by which this onerous taxation should be so diverted to the advancement of private individuals, of adventurers, that more money was actually appropriated out of the treasury of Mississippi in a period of five years for the purpose of supporting a partisan newspaper than there was for the purpose of education. He would say also that when funds had been raised for education, instead of being carefully and economically disposed of, in many instances the fund was appropriated in buying at extravagant rates, in order to enrich officials and their friends, expensive furniture for school-houses and in paying large salaries to county superintendents and State superintendents. And after all this he would say "this was done because I did not know how to exercise the political power which was vested in me; I meant to do right; I knew no better; I was not trained in statecraft; but I was obliged in my ignorance to do what no voter ought ever to do, vote at the dictation of another. Circumstanced as I am and as my race is in Mississippi, the great need for me and for mine is that we may be enabled to discharge the trusts and the responsibilities of citizenship properly." That his material advancement, his capacity to make money, to deal with other men was not equal to his necessites in life; that he was incompetent to cope in his dealings with sharpers and dishonest men; and he would point to his present poverty, and want of property, and probably say that a great deal of this is attributable to that. And if the argument was stated to him that many years ago a large donation was made to the State of Mississippi for the purpose of education, that many thousand acres of land at one time, and the sixteenth section in each township at another time, and a university fund at another time, he would answer: "When these donations were made I was not a citizen, I was not a voter; if they were misappropriated and lost, I am not responsible for it;" and then, referring to the history to which I have just alluded, he would add that every educational fund which had been donated in recent times by Congress to the State of Mississippi had also been lost. There was the agricultural school fund, which came to the State of Mississippi during the unhappy era of reconstruction, amounting to about $200,000, every single dollar of which had been applied during that era to other purposes than education, and that taxation in Mississippi to-day, taken every year from the hard earnings of the people, is necessary to pay the interest on that fund. He could say the same thing as to taxation in reference to the Chickasaw school fund, which was lost during the war, and the same thing in reference to the university fund. "All of these grand donations," he would say, "have been nothing to us; they have been lost, and without our fault."

So, Mr. President, whatever may be said about donations of school funds to the State of Mississippi, it can not be charged to the colored man that they are lost. Nor do I think that the white people there can be charged with this loss, but I am speaking now simply from the colored man's standpoint.

If one of these colored men should hear that my colleague and myself were opposed to this bill, and he wanted to express his views in reference to our action, he would probably say to us: "Why, I was born in Mississippi; I was reared in Mississippi with your people and with you. When the war came and all the able-bodied white men of Mississippi had left the State for the purpose of engaging in it, leaving here only the women and children, I and my race staid here, we cultivated the soil, we took care of your wives and children during that conflict, although we knew that our fate as free men or slaves depended upon the result. You represent us as well as you do the white people of Mississippi. Will you now resist this opportunity? Will you reject this offering?"

Mr. President, in face of an argument of that sort, an appeal of that sort, and other arguments relating to the interest of the white race, I confess that I am unable to vote against this bill if there be constitutional ground for it. Of course the most pressing necessity, the most exigent emergency, can never justify the exercise of a power by this body not granted to it by the Constitution; and, however much I might see the necessity of this measure, I should be compelled, as some of my brethren on this side of the Chamber feel compelled, to oppose it if I believed we did not have the constitutional power to pass it. I do not propose to go over that ground now; but the constitutional power of Congress to make this appropriation has been so vigorously assailed on this side of the Chamber that I feel that I am warranted, if not compelled, to make some answer.

In the first place, without going into the argument as to the true meaning of the Constitution as an original question, I propose to go into the history of this country, the constitutional history, for, after all, the Constitution is not the mere paper and ink with which it is written. It is not the mere dozen pages which you find in a book which makes what is the Constitution of the Union; its meaning is its life, and that meaning is to be ascertained by the constant practice of the Government under it. You can not make, no man can make, no nation can make, a written paper constitution otherwise than what the nation living under it habitually do under it, perform under it, and recognize as proper under it.

Commencing at the very earliest period of our history, we find appropriations made outside of the enumerated powers in the Constitution if we exclude the taxing power. I have a list of some to which I propose now to call attention.

In 1794, during the administration of George Washington, a bill was passed and received his signature appropriating $15,000 for the support of refugees from the Island of San Domingo. Mr. Madison was a member of Congress at the time. He opposed it upon the same ground that Senators oppose this bill, that it was not within the enumerated powers of the Constitution to make this appropriation, but Congress by a very decided majority passed the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Would it disturb my friend from Mississippi for me to ask him a question in this connection?

Mr. GEORGE. Not at all.

Mr. HARRIS. I infer from the Senator's last remark that he proposes to refer to various acts of Congress as probably putting a construction upon the constitutional powers of Congress. The question I want to ask him is this: Would he as a judge sitting upon the bench look at the express literalism of a power of attorney from a principal to an agent to determine what the powers of the agent were, or would he look to the acts of the agent under the power of attorney?

Mr. GEORGE. If the principal for a long series of years upon a doubtful clause in the power knew that the agent had done thus and so, and acquiesced in and ratified the agent's action, I would look at that acquiescence and that ratification as a construction of the power of attorney, and that is undoubted law.

There is a series of acts to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, in which appropriations made by Congress, commencing in the year 1801 and up to the present time, by which millions of dollars have been appropriated out of the Federal Treasury in aid of American seamen in foreign countries. Commencing under Jefferson in 1801, going through every President from that time down, these appropriations have been made of large amounts in aid of American seamen in foreign countries. Where is the power to do that under the construction placed upon the Constitution by my friend from Tennessee? Will he answer? I ask him now. I pause for a reply.

Mr. HARRIS. I am not responsible for it.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Tennessee says he is not responsible for it. No, he is not if he disapproves it, but the fathers of the Republic and all the great statesmen from them down to the present day are responsible, and the American people are responsible for it because they acquiesced in it.

Mr. MORGAN. I submit to the Senator whether he could not find power to aid American seamen in foreign countries under the power to regulate commerce with foreign countries?

Mr. GEORGE. I answer that Congress has the same power to regulate commerce among the States as it has to regulate commerce with foreign nations. The two powers are conferred in exactly the same language and in the same clause of the Constitution. Does that give to Congress the power to take care of the agencies of commerce between the States? Can you take care of broken merchants, and of commercial travelers, and of the stage-drivers, and all that sort of thing because they happen to be engaged in commerce among the States? I think the Senator from Alabama will have to look to some other clause of the Constitution for that power.

In 1796, under the administration of George Washington, an act was passed by which $4,000 was donated out of the national Treasury to two American citizens who had paid that sum to ransom themselves from the Government of Algiers. Where is your power to make that appropriation under the construction placed upon the Constitution by the Senators on this side who oppose the bill?

Then in 1812, under James Madison, for whose memory and opinions the Senators who oppose this bill on this side of the Chamber have so much reverence, receiving his signature, an appropriation was made by which the President of the United States, James Madison himself, was directed to purchase provisions and in the name of the United States to give them to the Government of Venezuela to aid certain of its citizens who had suffered from an earthquake. Where is the power to make that grant under the construction placed upon the Constitution by the Senators who oppose this bill? Madison was President then, and he signed the bill. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] suggests that that comes from the earthquake power in the Constitution. [Laughter.] If we can take money out of the Treasury of the United States raised by taxation from the laborers of this country, as my friend from Alabama would say, and give it to people living in Venezuela, it does seem to me we might give a little of that money back to the very people who paid it.

Then in 1813 Mr. Madison signed another bill of the same character passed by Congress. If there is anything settled in the constitutional history of this country it is that the police powers of the State embrace everything connected with the sanitary condition of the people and their health; and yet Mr. Madison, to aid the States, not to usurp a power which had been reserved to them under the Constitution, signed a bill by which vaccine matter was to be distributed among the people. Where is your authority for that under your construction of the Constitution?

Then, sir, in 1847 ships of war were sent from the United States to convey provisions to the starving people of Ireland. Gentlemen may say, the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] may say, that was not money out of the Treasury, that was property, and Congress had authority to dispose of the property of the United States as it saw proper. But can two ships of war be run from the port of New York to the port of Dublin and return without money from the Treasury of the United States?

Then in 1867 public ships were used for the purpose of transporting provisions to the Southern people who had suffered from drought; and in 1871 we sent similar ships to carry provisions to the starving people of France and Germany.

And then, sir, to come down to our grand Centennial Exposition of 1876, millions of dollars were voted out of the Federal Treasury for that. Where is the power to do that under the specified, enumerated powers of the Constitution?

And then, later than that, only a year or two ago, over a million dollars was voted out of the Federal Treasury to aid in a similar exposition in the city of New Orleans. Where is your power to do that under the construction placed upon the Constitution by the gentlemen who oppose this bill? Has Congress the power to go into the show business and yet not power to aid in educating the people?

Then I was about to say, and I believe I will say it, that there is not a single session of Congress in which appropriations are not habitually made, without objection or question on the part of anybody, which can have no warrant except under that construction of the Constitution which the friends of this bill on this side of the Chamber give to it. Where is the authority for your Agricultural Department, by which over a half million dollars every year is taken out of the Federal Treasury? I should like the Senator from Alabama, who made an effort to answer me on one point just now, to answer me on that. Where is your power to establish the Agricultural Department, to pay these men for going out and getting up agricultural statistics and buying seeds and distributing them among the people of this country?

Mr. MORGAN. I might equally ask the Senator where he finds the power in the Constitution to establish the Department of the Interior. There is no such department mentioned there. I presume the Government has authority to provide the necessary agencies of government. I have never believed it was a constitutional appropriation to distribute seeds.

Mr. GEORGE. What do you think about buying silk-worm eggs?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think that is, either.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very sorry to hear the Senator say so, because I remember not much more than a year ago the Senator and myself were engaged for a whole evening in trying to persuade this body to increase the appropriation for buying silk-worm eggs from $15,000 to $30,000.

Mr. MORGAN. I have been insisting on this bill also that if we intend to appropriate $77,000,000 for the education of the negroes we should educate those over twenty-one years of age. I am trying to get as good a bill as I can.

Mr. GEORGE. I will show before I get through that the Senator has changed his mind about the twenty-one years of age. I got no answer from the Senator, nor will the country accept that as an answer, to the question which I put to him.

I will go a little further; and the Senator is at liberty at any time when I propound him questions, or any one else who occupies the opposite side of this argument, to answer. I should be glad to have light from the Senator and his friends, and the country would like to have light; the country would like to know whether or not our yearly, I might say almost daily, practice here is in violation of the Constitution or not.

There is the Geological Survey. Where is the power in the Constitution to expend money for that purpose?

Then the transit of Venus. I believe we sent ships and men to the other side of the world to observe the transit of Venus. I suppose the Senator from Alabama and the other Senators who oppose this bill will be able to find some power in the Constitution for that. Carrying out the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON], made a little while ago, I suppose it will come from the celestial power of the Constitution.

Then we have sent out expeditions to explore the Amazon and all that magnificent country there, costing the Government thousands and thousands of dollars. What right under the construction of the Constitution to which these gentlemen allude and which they insist we are bound by had we to send those expeditions? What right did we have to send Captain Wilkes around the globe with his ships to examine all parts of it? What power under the Constitution, construed as claimed by them, would authorize it?

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator yield to me a moment, if he does not object to an interruption?

Mr. GEORGE. Not at all.

Mr. GRAY. I ask if the power to send Commodore Wilkes around the world was not a necessary incident to the power to maintain a navy; and whether it is possible to maintain a navy without its being exercised and having duties prescribed for the fleets which compose it, as much so as a naval pageant is sometimes enacted off the coast?

Mr. GEORGE. What about the exploration of the Amazon? What has that to do with the Navy? Is it necessary to send vessels all around the globe for naval purposes? I should like to know what authority you have to send an expedition to the North Pole? We did not send our Navy there, and yet we paid out many thousands of dollars for expeditions of that sort.

Then, sir, we have surveyed the Nicaragua route for a canal and we have surveyed the Panama route, and all at the expense of the Federal Treasury—out of money raised by taxation. Where is your authority for that under the construction placed upon the Constitution by the Senators who oppose this bill?

Then what about the Indians? We are voting money to educate them at every session of Congress. Where is the authority under the Constitution to vote money to educate Indians which at the same time prohibits us from voting money to educate the white people and the colored people of this country? Has an Indian more interest in this country than the posterity of the framers of the Constitution, for whose benefit they declared it was made?

There is no power conferred by the Constitution with reference to Indians at all except to regulate commerce with them. Indians are only mentioned in the Constitution three times; once in the clause giving Congress power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States and with the Indian tribes, and twice where it says that they shall not be counted, if they are not taxed, in making an apportionment of representation. Will the Senators who now sit silently by, if they do not expressly vote for all these sums to the Indians, say that the power comes from the commerce clause? If it does, then under the same clause we shall get the power to educate all the people of this country, because the Constitution says Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the States and with the Indian tribes. If the latter part of that confers the power on Congress to educate the Indians, then the first part of it confers the power to educate the white and black people in the States.

Then here is this grand Congressional Library of ours, costing millions and millions of dollars. I should like to know under what clause of the Constitution we vote money to have this large library under the construction placed upon the Constitution by the Senator from Texas, the Senator from Tennessee, and the Senator from Alabama. Will the Senators say that the Congressional Library is necessary for the Senators and Representatives to enlighten them so that they may properly discharge their duties? Is that the argument the Senators will advance? If so, I should like to know the distinction between an appropriation to educate Senators and Representatives and an appropriation to educate their constituents. It seems to me the Constitution was not made alone for Senators and Representatives and for the other public officers about Washington, but for the people of the United States.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Mississippi if his argument on the Congressional Library would go so far as to claim the right to establish a library in any other city dissociated entirely from the Congress of the United States?

Mr. GEORGE. Whenever a bill is brought before this body for the purpose of establishing a library in any other city I will answer that question. I am just now trying to find out from these gentlemen where they get the power to have it here except under the "general-welfare" clause of the taxing power.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator charges on men of this generation all that has been done from the foundation of the Government and holds them responsible for it. Perhaps it would be more candid in him to say whether he favored all these measures or would have done it if he were then here. But in respect to the Library, has the Senator forgotten that Congress has the exclusive right to legislate for this District as the Legislature of Mississippi has the right to legislate for Mississippi; and will he deny that Mississippi or Alabama could furnish a library to the supreme court or a library to the Legislature or a library to a college in the State?

Mr. GEORGE. Now I should like the Senator from Alabama to answer this question, whether the 500,000 volumes in the Congressional Library are necessary for the use of the people of this District?

Mr. MORGAN. That is not a constitutional question. I supposed that the ex-chief-justice of the supreme court of Mississippi could certainly take a distinction between a question of policy and one of constitutional law. I had that opinion of him.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very sorry to lose the good opinion of the Senator from Alabama, but I think before I get through he will find out that I have not got as much respect for his constitutional opinions as he has for mine. [Laughter.]

Here is the extra pay we vote to the employés of the Senate every session, and the Senator from Alabama I noticed on one occasion was the author of the resolution for that purpose—a month's extra pay, a small matter it is true; but where did he get the power to do it? You do not owe them anything; they have served here for the pay fixed by law, and it is a mere gift.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to answer that? We have the same right to vote them extra pay when the Senate is not in session as we have to vote to the Senator from Mississippi or myself a monthly salary when the Senate is not in session.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not doubt the right of the Senate to give us our salary. I am claiming that they have the right and I claim that we have the right to vote this extra pay, but I am asking the Senator from Alabama to show me the clause of the Constitution which authorizes this extra pay. That is the question before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. The clause is that which enables us to provide for the expenses of Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. Is that an expense of Congress—a donation made after Congress adjourns?

Mr. MORGAN. Just as much as it is to keep you on your pay during the vacation.

Mr. GEORGE. We have an annual salary, and the gentleman offered a resolution here to give the men who have an annual salary an extra month's pay.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, no; that will not do.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not remember myself whether it applied to the annual salary men or to the monthly salary men; but what is the difference? The question is whether Congress has a right to make a donation, a benefaction, a gift. I say they have the right to do it, but I say you can not find it according to the theory of the Senator from Alabama and of the gentlemen who oppose this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Does it come under the general-welfare clause?

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. HARRIS. So I supposed.

Mr. GEORGE. Where is the authority of Congress to vote the immense sums they vote for pensions—for pensions after the service was rendered?

Mr. MORGAN. You find that in the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. You will not find it in the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. In the fourteenth.

Mr. GEORGE. You will not find it in the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, you will.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the gentleman read from the fourteenth amendment the authority to pay pensions? I think there is something in the fourteenth amendment about recognizing pensions, pensions already granted, not pensions to be granted afterwards. There is no attempt in the fourteenth amendment to confer on Congress a power which it already possessed to grant pensions, a mere bounty of the Government, a gracious and beneficent bounty, a bounty in strict accord with the Constitution, a bounty for which I feel at liberty to vote whenever the proposition is made; but according to the theory upon which this bill is opposed, I should like to know where the authority is to grant pensions.

Mr. MORGAN. Section 4 of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution says:

> The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned.

Not even "questioned!"

Mr. GEORGE. "Debts," debts already created.

Mr. MORGAN. And pensions.

Mr. GEORGE. Debts created for pensions and bounties. It only refers to debts already created. It does not confer on Congress authority to create any more debts or give any more pensions because Congress already had that power.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him, but I understood that he asked a general question.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course, if I am wrong I can be corrected.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Mississippi whether he can not find any constitutional warrant for granting pensions or for increasing pensions in the grant to Congress of the power to raise and support armies; and whether in that grant, which like all other grants of power carries with it in a very wide scope all that is incidental and necessary to perfectly execute and make efficient that power, the right to allow pensions is not as much a part of that power, as necessary an incident to it, as the right to pay the troops or provide for their maintenance and comfort?

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is very correct if he would confine himself to pensions which were conferred by law as an inducement to enlist in the Army; but I should like to know what a pension granted on this day, the 24th of February, 1886, has to do with the supporting of an army raised in 1846 for the Mexican war or in 1861 for the civil war? Recollect now I am not denying the power of Congress to grant pensions; I think we have ample power, but we do not get it from the power to raise and support armies; we do not get it, I mean, in this respect long years after the armies have been raised and disbanded; we do not get it from that power then.

Where do you get the power to build the monument to Washington, that splendid shaft on the banks of the Potomac, except under the power to raise and appropriate money for the general welfare? There is no other power to pass the bill we passed yesterday to erect a monument to that great soldier and statesman General Grant. Certainly that was not necessary to raise and support an army. If it be necessary to raise and support armies to erect monuments after the armies have been disbanded for many years, then we are bound to build a monument to every citizen of the United States who ever served in the Army either in the civil war or in any other war. It comes from the power granted to raise money to provide for the general welfare; that is to show the people of this country that the nation honors and respects great and patriotic services; and that is all I claim.

It does seem to me when we compare these transactions of the Government with the theory of the Constitution advocated by the opponents of this bill that it is a great misfortune that the people of the United States are not either Indians, or inhabitants of the isles of the sea, or of some foreign country, or possibly of some celestial planet, so that they might derive some benefit from the taxes which they are compelled to pay.

Then come two or three of the greatest transactions in this country in which money was spent, and I should like to know where the power exists in the Federal Constitution, under the construction placed on it by the opponents of this bill, to make the purchase of Louisiana, the purchase of Alaska, the purchase of that magnificent domain which we acquired from Mexico, the purchase of Florida, the purchase under the Gadsden treaty of a still further strip of the Mexican territory.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I will; I should like to know where it comes from. Mr. Jefferson did not find it.

Mr. MAXEY. The Supreme Court of the United States did find it in American Insurance Company vs. Canter, reported in 3 Peters, decided at the January term, 1829. The Supreme Court declared that Congress has the undoubted right to acquire territory either under the war-making power or the treaty-making power. That decision was by Chief-Justice Marshall.

Mr. GEORGE. Where did they get the money to pay for it except under the general-welfare clause?

Mr. MAXEY. He puts it on the war-making power or the treaty-making power.

Mr. GEORGE. How could they get the money by taxation unless under the general-welfare clause?

Mr. GRAY. There was never any question or trouble about obtaining the money. The constitutional warrant is clear for obtaining money to execute any grant of express power or any implied power.

Mr. GEORGE. There was no grant of power to purchase Louisiana.

Mr. GRAY. But I understood the Senator from Texas to say that it had been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that under the treaty-making power or the war-making power there was the right in Congress to acquire territory. If that right is established—and the decision of the Supreme Court establishes it—the appropriation necessarily follows.

Mr. GEORGE. I would like to know what right the treaty-making power has to acquire foreign territory except for the general welfare. What right have you to make war except for the general welfare? It all comes down to that at last. There is no express limit in the Constitution on the power to make war, whether war should be declared only for the general welfare or at the caprice of Congress. I argued, and I think successfully, during the last Congress in the debate on this bill, with the Senator from Texas that the words "general welfare" were to be considered as repeated under every specific grant of the Constitution, and that is what is meant.

Commencing from the earliest days of the Constitution, extending down to the very moment in which I am now speaking, we find an unbroken series of precedents in favor of the construction the friends of this bill place on the Constitution, having the sanction of the greatest names that ever adorned American history. Now, what is their value as a construction of the Constitution?

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator has been so often interrupted that I wish he would allow me to make a little statement.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I believe nobody denies that this is, as to all external powers, a nation. It is one among the family of nations. Bancroft observes that as a nation its garment is without a seam. It may do all that becomes a nation. In no one of the things the Senator has mentioned have I seen the National Government interfering with a work that has been traditionally for two centuries in the hands of the communities and States themselves.

Mr. GEORGE. That does not help the case in the least. Suppose we are a nation. I admit we are a nation as to foreign states; but what powers have we as a nation? I am answering the argument made by Senators who sit before me. We have, according to their view, no other powers than those which are nominated in the Constitution, which created us a nation so far as we are a nation. That is the argument of the Senators who oppose this bill. The Constitution gives the Federal Government powers with reference to other nations. We can send embassadors; we can receive embassadors sent by them; we can send consuls; we can receive consuls; we can make war on them; we can make peace with them; we can make treaties with them; and that is all we can do. There is no power in the Constitution under the theory of those who oppose this bill—under my theory there is—no express power, no enumerated power, as the opponents of this bill insist, to do anything with foreign nations except the things which I have enumerated.

I was going on to say something about the force of precedents. Upon that subject allow me to reproduce some authorities which were read to the Senate the other day by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON]; and the first one which I will read is from the great master of that constitutional theory upon which the opponents of this bill rest their case. I read from the quotation of Mr. Madison contained in the speech of the Senator from Tennessee:

> Can it be of less consequence that the meaning of a constitution should be fixed and known than that the meaning of a law should be so? Can, indeed, a law be fixed in its meaning and operation unless the Constitution be so? On the contrary, if a particular Legislature, differing in the construction of the Constitution from a series of preceding constructions, proceed to act on that difference, they not only introduce uncertainty and instability in the Constitution, but in the laws themselves, inasmuch as all laws preceding the new construction and inconsistent with it are not only annulled for the future, but virtually pronounced nullities from the beginning. * * * Has the wisest and most conscientious judge ever scrupled to acquiesce in decisions in which he has been overruled by the matured opinions of the majority of his colleagues and subsequently to conform himself thereto as to authoritative expositions of the law? And is it not reasonable that the same view of the official oath should be taken by a legislator acting under the Constitution, which is his guide, as is taken by a judge acting under the law, which is his?
> There is in fact and in common understanding a necessity of regarding a course of practice as above characterized in the light of a legal rule of interpreting a law; and there is a like necessity of considering it a constitutional rule of interpreting a constitution. * * * Let it then be left to the decision of every intelligent and candid judge which, on the whole, is most to be relied on for the true and safe construction of the Constitution, that which has the uniform sanction of successive legislative bodies through a period of years and under the varied ascendency of parties; not that which depends upon the opinions of every new Legislature, heated as it may be by the spirit of party, eager in the pursuit of some favorite object, or led away by the eloquence and address of popular statesmen—

Like the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the Senator who sits before me [Mr. COKE]— > themselves perhaps under the influence of the same misleading causes. It was in conformity with the view here taken of the respect due to deliberate and reiterated precedent that the Bank of the United States, though on the original question held to be unconstitutional, received the executive signature in the year 1817.

That is what Mr. Madison said about precedents. If you disregard precedents you make the Constitution uncertain and unstable. You have a Constitution to-day that means one thing under the lead of the Senator from Alabama and his associates on this side of the Chamber, and next year we have a Constitution that means an entirely different thing under the lead of some other statesmen; and what are the people of this country to know or believe about their Constitution if it is thus construed according to the whim, the caprice, or even the judgment of successive Congresses to make it mean one thing this year and another the next year?

Here we have a set of precedents commencing with the birth of the Constitution, receiving the sanction of the Father of his Country, extending all the way down from him to the very moment in which I am now addressing the Senate; and yet Senators say that they have a right to set up their private judgment, their private views of what the Constitution is, in opposition to all this line of precedents.

There was another great man who expressed himself upon the value of precedents and changed his constitutional action upon them. If Andrew Jackson and James Madison could afford to change their original views about the Constitution of the United States in obedience to a line of precedents, in the one case not twenty years in existence and in the other not over thirty-five, can not Senators on this floor yield their views of the Constitution to the same line of precedents now prolonged nearly to a century?

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator yield for a moment once more?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will yield to the force of precedent as every man must do, but I call the Senator's attention to this series of precedents: Every State in this Union from the beginning to this day has established every one of its district schools and paid for every one of them. The United States has never created a district school or paid for one.

Mr. GEORGE. And they do not propose to do it by this bill either. They only propose to aid the States; and the Government of the United States has been from the very beginning aiding the States to do that very thing, sometimes, as in this bill, by the grant of money derived if you please from all the sources from which money can go into the Treasury, and in other cases by a grant of lands belonging to the United States and money derived from the sales of those lands.

So the precedents are with me, and I will dwell on these precedents a little more when I get on further, because as I am a States-rights Democrat, and as my consistency as such has been assailed on this floor, I mean to prove beyond controversy or cavil that I am with the fathers in their construction of the Constitution.

When I was interrupted I was about to read from Andrew Jackson, a man who in his day occupied a proud position in this country, a man whose name is venerated now for his great services in peace and war and for his sound constitutional opinions throughout the length and breadth of this Union. General Jackson found it necessary to change his views of the Constitution in obedience to precedents. He says, referring to the construction of the Constitution which limits the power of appropriation of money to the subjects expressly enumerated in the Constitution:

> The symmetry and purity of the Government would doubtless have been better preserved if this restriction of the power of appropriation could have been maintained without weakening its ability to fulfill the great objects of its institution, an effect so likely to attend its admission, notwithstanding its apparent fitness, that every subsequent administration of the Government, embracing a period of thirty out of the forty-two years of its existence, has adopted a more enlarged construction of the power.

Then further:

> A restriction of the power "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" to cases which are to be provided for by the expenditure of money would still leave within the legislative power of Congress all the great and most important measures of Government, money being the ordinary and necessary means of carrying them into execution.

And further:

> I have not been able to consider these declarations [of Mr. Madison] in any other point of view than as a concession that the right of appropriation is not limited by the power of Congress to carry into effect the measure for which the money is asked, as was formerly contended.

And then most significantly on this point:

> That the public good and the nature of our political institutions require that individual differences should yield to well-settled acquiescence of the people and confederated authorities in particular constructions of the Constitution on doubtful points. Not to concede this much to the spirit of our institutions would impair their stability and defeat the objects of the Constitution itself.

And yet Senators say, with all this long line of precedents and with all these great authorities enforcing the necessity of observing them, that they stand upon what they regard as the original and rightful construction of the Constitution without reference to the precedents. Mr. Calhoun took the same view as General Jackson, as quoted by the Senator from Tennessee, but I will come down nearer the present day. Gentlemen may say these are all antiquated; we have outlived the opinions of these men. Now, I will see what the statesmen of the present day and one of the Senators who oppose this measure say. When the education bill was up in the Forty-sixth Congress, third session, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] made a very able and eloquent defense of that measure, and the subject of its constitutionality he disposed of in this sentence:

> The power of Congress is too firmly established by precedent to be now questioned.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator will permit me to say that that speech was made in reference to the disposition of the proceeds of the public lands.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not quote it for the purpose of committing the Senator from Texas to the constitutionality of this bill. I quoted it to commit him to the general principle that precedent would settle the construction of the Constitution. I will show before I get through that he did concede with reference to that bill all that is necessary to make this bill constitutional.

So, sir, we have precedents from the beginning of the Government down to the present hour in favor of the constitutionality of this measure. We have the opinions of the great fathers of the Constitution, the great lights of the Democratic party in the olden times, and also in the present day in the person of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY]. These precedents establish the proposition on which this bill is based—that Congress may appropriate money for the general welfare without thereby assuming any power or jurisdiction over the subject to which the appropriation is made. That education is for the general welfare is too clear for argument; and this bill assumes no other power over it than to appropriate money to aid the States in carrying on their common schools.

[At this point the honorable Senator yielded the floor to enable the Senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business.]

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Mississippi is somewhat fatigued and has not concluded his remarks. It being agreeable to him, if it be agreeable to the Senate, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no, let us finish this bill to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Now I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It can not be done. The order is being executed.

Several SENATORS. Regular order! Regular order!

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on the Public Lands.

I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back the bill (S. 150) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, and to ask its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that all the lands along the Des Moines River above the mouth of the Raccoon Fork, in the State of Iowa, referred to in the joint resolution of March 2, 1861 (12 Statutes, page 251), as certified to said State improperly by the Department of the Interior as under the grant of August 8, 1846, and which were treated in the Harvey settlement, of May 20, 1866, as having been sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States, as mentioned or provided in the act of July 12, 1862 (12 Statutes, page 543), to extend the grant of 1846, and for which lands the State, in the Harvey settlement, received and accepted by the Department of the Interior after Secretary Browning's decision of May 9, 1868, and that by such settlement Iowa, in accepting the indemnity lands as referred to, is estopped from all claim to the lands in place that were improperly certified as river land or under the act of 1846; and

Whereas there are many settlers who, believing that the said lands were public lands, entered upon the same in good faith, and with the consent of the Department of the Interior, as pre-emptions and homesteads, and since so doing, and after receiving patents, have been held by the courts as trespassers, or that the lands were reserved from settlement: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all the lands improperly certified to Iowa by the Department of the Interior under the act of August 8, 1846, as referred to in the joint resolution of March 2, 1861, for which indemnity lands were selected and received by the State of Iowa, as provided in the act of 1862, are, and are hereby declared to be, public lands of the United States: Provided, That the title of all bona fide settlers under color of title from the State of Iowa and its grantees, or the United States and its grantees, which do not come in conflict with pre-emption or homestead claimants, are hereby ratified and confirmed, and made valid: Provided further, That the claims of all persons who, with intent, in good faith, to obtain title thereto under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States, entered or remained upon any tract of said land prior to January, 1880, not exceeding 160 acres, are hereby confirmed and made valid in them, their heirs or their proper assigns, and upon due proof thereof, and payment of the usual price or fees, where the same has not been paid, shall be carried to patent: Provided further, That the title of all bona fide claimants under color of title from the State of Iowa and its grantees, or the United States and its grantees, which do not come in conflict with persons who, with intent, in good faith, to obtain title thereto under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States, settled upon the said lands prior to January, 1880, are confirmed and made valid.

SEC. 2. That it is hereby made the duty of the Attorney-General, within ninety days after the passage of this act, to institute, or cause to be instituted, such suit or suits, either in law or equity, or both, as may be necessary and proper to assert and protect the title of the United States to said lands and remove all clouds from its title thereto; and until such suits shall be determined, and Congress shall so provide, no part of said lands shall be open for settlement or sale except as hereinbefore provided. And in any suits so instituted any person or persons in possession of or claiming title to any tract or tracts of land under the United States involved in such suits may, at his or their expense, unite with the United States in the prosecution of such suits.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, a bill identical with this has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Public Lands. Accompanying that is a printed report containing the facts upon which the bill is based, and requiring forty-seven printed pages. The number of this report is 491.

In different forms the relief which is sought by this bill has been before Congress since and before the Forty-third Congress, and with one exception there never has been an adverse report as against the interests involved in the bill. While the facts upon which the bill is based are very voluminous, covering, as I have said, forty-odd printed pages, I think perhaps they may be concisely stated, so that the members of the House can understand the principles involved, and which form the basis of the bill, in a very few minutes.

The amount of land involved in this bill is, in round numbers, 270,000 acres. In 1846 an act of Congress was passed granting to the State of Iowa certain lands in alternate sections on either side of the Des Moines River for the purpose of aiding in the improvement of the navigation of that river. The grant was accepted by the State of Iowa on the 9th of January, 1847. Some time during that year the governor of the State appointed a commission to make selection of the lands that were involved in the grant, and these lands were selected, being the odd-numbered sections on either side of the river from its confluence with the Mississippi River in a northwesterly direction, and on either side of the river, up to about the point where the city of Des Moines is now located.

The improvement of the river which was contemplated by the act of Congress was from the Mississippi River to the mouth of the Raccoon Fork, about the center of the State. The Des Moines River, I may say, enters into the State at its northwest corner, flows southeastwardly toward its southeast corner, dividing the State practically into two equal parts, and, as I have said, the mouth of the Raccoon Fork is about the center of the State.

When the grant was made it was assumed by those who passed the bill, as well as by the officers of the Department of the Interior, that the grant of land only extended up to the mouth of the Fork, and the selection was made with that construction of the act in view. In a few years somebody, the record is silent as to who started it, construed the act to mean that the State of Iowa was entitled to these alternate sections on either side of the river to the extreme source of the river to the northwest; and disputes were had before the Secretary of the Interior as to what the proper construction was. It finally resulted in an opinion of the Secretary of the Interior in 1852, Secretary Stuart, who held that the land extended northwardly to the northern limit of the State; and a certification of the land was made certifying to the State of Iowa these alternate sections of land on either side to the northern boundary of the State. And as the act provided the State of Iowa should dispose of these lands the State appointed a kind of State land office, and the lands were offered for sale, and large amounts of land, 55,990 acres, were sold by the State of Iowa under this construction of the law. About this time the question got into the courts as to what the proper construction of this act was, and in a case which is known in this legislation as the Litchfield case the Supreme Court of the United States decided that a proper construction of the act was that the grant was limited to such portions of the land as lay upon either side of the Des Moines River up to the mouth of the Fork, and that the State of Iowa took nothing beyond that point.

But, as I have said, Mr. Speaker, the State had sold 55,000 acres of this land to various parties, and they were in possession and improving it; and hence the necessity for some kind of validating action. In 1861 an appeal was made to Congress in behalf of the people who had thus bought these lands, and a joint resolution was passed by Congress validating the title of all persons who had purchased from the State of Iowa and stood as bona fide purchasers under this construction of the act of Congress making this grant. Prior to that time, I may say, a company was organized, known as the Des Moines River Railroad and Navigation Company, which, under a contract with the State of Iowa, and in consideration of a grant to this company by the State of such lands as were granted by Congress to the State, undertook the improvement of the Des Moines River. After spending some money—I have forgotten the amount, but it is immaterial here—they had proceeded with the work of construction, but after the Litchfield case was decided, where it was held that nothing passed to the State above the mouth of the Fork, and that the company would be limited in its claim to such lands as lay below the Fork, they declined to proceed any further, and a compromise was entered into between the navigation company and the State of Iowa, by which the navigation company agreed to receive from the State of Iowa such lands as it received from the General Government, and call everything square between them; and in 1859 or 1860 a deed was made by the governor of the State, pursuant to a resolution passed by the General Assembly of that State, making a conveyance to the navigation company of such lands as it took by reason of this grant, and work on the river was abandoned.

Involved in this grant above the fork were two hundred and seventy-one thousand and some odd hundred acres. The State had sold, as I have said, some 55,000 acres, leaving in round numbers about a quarter of a million of acres of lands which were not included within the grant, and therefore were treated by the Interior Department as public lands. A large number of settlers then went on those lands. The local land offices at Des Moines and Sioux City, holding the lands were public lands, recognized the entries, and the thing went along in that way.

In 1864 Congress passed another act granting all the lands that were above the mouth of the Raccoon Fork to certain railroad companies, and it was thought that these railway companies took an interest in the land by reason of this act of Congress. That question got into the courts, and the courts in Iowa held, and afterward the decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in a case known as the Wolcott case, that, because the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Stuart, had made certification to these lands away back in 1851 to the State of Iowa, and the lands were in a condition of reservation—the technical term "reserved" being used—for the benefit of this Des Moines River improvement, that therefore the railroad companies could take nothing by reason of the act of Congress, and that the lands still remained public lands. Under that decision from that time down to now those lands have been in that condition. The navigation company have been claiming that under the deed which they received from the State of Iowa, although that deed was only a quitclaim deed in form, the subsequent title of the State of Iowa under the joint resolution of 1861 inures to the navigation company. The settlers who have gone in upon those lands claim that because the Supreme Court had decided in the original case that neither the navigation company nor the State of Iowa could take anything above the mouth of the Raccoon Fork, therefore they had a right to make settlement upon the lands. Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill simply proposes to give parties who have made homestead and pre-emption filings upon these lands upon the assumption that they were public lands and that they had a right to make such filings—the object of the bill is to give those parties a standing in court, so that they may have the question judicially determined whether or not these are public lands subject to entry and homestead settlement. It does not attempt to divest anybody of any vested right. Indeed it would be powerless if it undertook so to do; but the people who are upon these lands meet with this difficulty in undertaking to litigate their titles.

It is a familiar principle of real-estate law in connection with the administration of the public land system that there can be no valid pre-emption filing or valid homestead settlement upon any land that is technically "reserved" by the Interior Department; and because this land was reserved by the action of the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Stuart, and that reservation has never been removed by the Interior Department or by any act of Congress, no valid pre-emption settlement can be made, none that the courts will recognize. Therefore these settlers are powerless when they go into court and ask for a recognition of their rights, and that a test may be instituted between themselves and the claimants under the navigation company. But an act of Congress was passed in 1853 which provides in terms—and it is by virtue of this act that these pre-emptors and homesteaders may have relief—that when any land is in a state of "reservation," and is entered upon in good faith by pre-emptors or homestead settlers, if at any time, by act of Congress or by action of the Secretary of the Interior, the reservation is removed, then these parties shall have the prior right to recognition in the Interior Department to file their claims or to perfect their filings by the subsequent proofs which the land laws require.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the object of this bill. The blight of uncertainty of title has rested upon these lands ever since this contest began, and while there have been various cases litigated and decisions of the Supreme Court apparently holding that the title of the navigation company is good under the quitclaim deed to which I have referred, every case which has been decided bears upon its face the evidence that it was collusive; that is, that the decision was based upon an agreed state of facts between the attorneys, and the questions which this bill covers have never been really presented.

Mr. OATES. I do not fully understand the gentleman's statement, and if he will permit I wish to ask him a question. Is the purpose of this bill to give the settlers a standing in court to quiet their titles?

Mr. PAYSON. No, sir; the purpose is to give them a standing in court that they may perfect the titles which they claim.

Mr. Speaker, I do not care to consume the time of the House by saying more about this bill on the present occasion; but if any gentleman who has listened to me desires to ask any questions I shall be very glad to answer them, if I can.

Mr. LONG. Is there a minority report?

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] I will state that this bill is unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands, and that such has been the uniform recommendation in this House for the last five years, and also in the Senate with one exception.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOLMES], in whose district a major portion of these lands lie, desires to address the House briefly on this bill, and I now yield him ten minutes of my time.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, it is now forty years since the Government made to the State of Iowa that magnificent grant of land intended to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Des Moines River. It was provided by the act of August 8, 1846, that there should be granted to the State of Iowa for that purpose alternate sections 5 miles in width on each side of the Des Moines River from its mouth to Raccoon Fork.

One of the primary requirements of that act was that the land should be used for that purpose and no other—in the words of the act, "and no other." That act provided exactly how that grant should be given to the State and the conditions upon which it should be received. For instance, it was provided that the lands not before conveyed or disposed of should be given to the Territory or State for that purpose, and that the Territory or State might sell so much of those lands as should produce the sum of $30,000, and then the sale should cease until the governor of the Territory or State should certify the fact to the President of the United States that one-half of that sum had been expended upon the improvements, when lands to a like amount might be again sold.

Now, the State of Iowa proceeded under this act to select these lands. It was provided in the act that the governor himself should appoint the agent. He did so. The lands were selected, and that selection was approved. It was filed in the office of the Secretary of State. The State of Iowa accepted the grant; the Government of the United States accepted it through its executive department; the matter was concluded and became a finality so far as that grant was concerned. James Shields, the acting Commissioner of the Land Office at that time, advised the State of Iowa that 261,000 acres of land were so selected, and that this would be the number of acres that would be received under the grant.

Up to that time no claim had ever been made that this grant extended above the Raccoon Fork; that is, above the present city of Des Moines. More than two years had elapsed in which the State of Iowa, and likewise the Government of the United States, had accepted that as the construction of the act. For more than two years it was never conceived that this grant extended up above the mouth of the Raccoon Fork; and there were various reasons why that was so. That country had been explored but about two years. Nicollet and John C. Frémont had just made their exploration of the country above the Raccoon Fork. It was occupied by the Sacs and Foxes, and still farther up by the Sioux Indians. The river was not then called the Des Moines River; above the Raccoon Fork it was known as the River Sioux, and above that it was called the Moingonan, and the East Fork was called "Moingonan's Brother." It was also called the Inyan Shasha River of the Sioux. The information in regard to that part of the country was so vague and uncertain that the name of the river was hardly definitely settled up to that time.

For several years the State of Iowa pursued the improvement of this river in accordance with the terms of the act by a board of public works. After that time a company was formed called the Des Moines Navigation Railroad Company, which, through some process I can not now explain, procured the transfer to itself of the entire franchise and right of the State in these lands, and agreed on its part to improve and perfect the navigation of the Des Moines River. Suffice it to say this company has never carried out a single requirement of that agreement. There never was even one certificate made by the governor to the President of the United States showing that one block amounting to $30,000 had been completed. It is true that long afterward the governor of Iowa made a deed for this land to this company, but the deed was without any warrant or authority; and certainly any deed by the governor of Iowa to a private company or corporation must be invalid and void, unless made in accordance with the terms of the grant by Congress.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And it is the fact that people went upon that land and established their homes——

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And many of them have received patents from the Government.

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir; some of these men have received patents from the Government. About the year 1854 this contract was made with the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company by which it took this grant and agreed to improve the river. That company has never finished one single dam or lock; on the contrary, it has damaged the river. In a report made to the senate and house of representatives of the State of Iowa by the commissioners appointed to examine this question, it is shown that the damages to the State and the people consequent upon what this company has done have been greater than the value of their pretended improvements.

Mr. OATES. The grant made to the State was made only in trust?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir; in trust—not in præsenti. It was only a conditional grant. I thank the gentleman for making the suggestion.

I wish to say that as to the lands above the Racoon Fork it is not pretended that one acre of that land up to this date has ever been patented or certified to the State of Iowa or its grantees; and this company can have no title. Yet they claim these lands.

In 1860 Mr. Litchfield, a large integral portion of the company, brought action against the Dubuque and Pacific Railroad to determine the question of title, as prior to that time a grant had been made across the State of Iowa for four railroads. These companies were to have the land in alternate sections for 6 miles on each side. That grant conflicted with the river grant, provided the claim that the river grant included the land above Racoon Fork was true. That case was tried; and it is the only case ever tried in which the rights of the Government in this matter were in the remotest manner presented or defended. They were in that case ably presented by Mr. Black, at that time Attorney-General. The result was that Mr. Litchfield and the river company were declared to have no title in any of the lands above the Raccoon Fork; that is to say, the lands now in question here.

Mr. MILLARD. Does this bill protect those persons who have entered and paid for their lands in good faith?

Mr. HOLMES. It does. It will be seen by the proviso that those who have purchased in good faith are protected.

The whole amount of lands in controversy here is small compared with the amount which the company will take. After the decision in the Litchfield case, which was in April, 1860, the joint resolution of 1861 was passed by Congress, providing that lands heretofore purchased by bona fide settlers in the State of Iowa should be released and that their title and claims should be made good to these lands. This company afterward procured the passage of the act of 1862, in which it was provided that their grant should extend to the north line of the State. But at the same time it was provided in that act it should be subject to this same act of 1846, with which they never complied.

Mr. PAYSON. I demand the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. PARKER. I think this should not be done. I do not say there are others who wish to speak, but for myself I should like to call the attention of the House to the history of the decisions to which reference has been made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PAYSON. I have no objection to withdrawing the demand for the previous question and yielding to the gentleman from New York. How much time does he desire?

Mr. PARKER. I do not wish to take the gentleman's time, but I take it the opposition has a right to be heard. I do not know whether there are others who wish to be heard, but I would like myself a little time.

Mr. PAYSON. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and reserve the balance of my time, so that the gentleman from New York can be recognized in his own right.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, this is the old Des Moines land case which has been here for many years before Congress, and has been one of the controversies which has disturbed Congress and the politics of the State of Iowa for many years. I would like to know of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] whether this is the same bill which passed through the Senate, but failed to pass through the House, at the last session?

Mr. PAYSON. It is.

Mr. PARKER. There has been a controversy for years over this land, and it is claimed by those who represent the navigation company that the parties who have earned this land, and have the right to it as I believe under decisions of the court, should not have their title disturbed by legislation of this kind; that it is an attempt on the part of those defeated in court under the decisions of the Supreme Court to open the case in Congress and give to the parties in possession of the land wrongfully rights they do not otherwise possess—to confirm titles where they have merely possession and to overrule the ordinary rights to all that particular property.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. This bill does not confer a single right on anybody or determine any question of title. It does not propose to, but simply allows the occupants of these lands to go into the courts and litigate the case to see whether they are the rightful owners or others.

Mr. PARKER. Why have they not the right to go into court now?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. They claim they have.

Mr. PARKER. They have not, because the courts have passed upon the question. This bill seeks to overrule the court, to change the natural rules of law, and give these men standing in court when under the decisions of the court they have no standing.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon. No decision of a court could preclude anybody except those particular parties in that particular suit. That is all. This case has not been decided as to these parties, and this is simply an enabling act.

Mr. PARKER. But the gentleman fails to show why they have not the right to go into court now. I understand it is, as I said, a case where the courts have passed upon it, and now an enabling act is necessary to overrule the court.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Not at all.

Mr. PARKER. To give them a hearing where otherwise they would not be entitled to a hearing.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a question?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not wish to anticipate the gentleman from New York, but will he say whether he expects during the course of his argument to call the attention of the House to a single case, either in the Supreme Court or in any inferior court, where the rights of settlers under the homestead or pre-emption law have ever been passed upon?

Mr. PARKER. I do not know they have directly, but in effect the ownership of the land has been passed upon.

Mr. PAYSON. No, sir. I will say for the information of the gentleman that no such case has been passed upon, and to the opponents of the bill I confidently assert no such case can be found.

Mr. PARKER. Then why is it necessary to bring forward this enabling act?

Mr. PAYSON. If the gentleman will yield I will say that this land, by certification of Secretary Stuart, certifying to the State of Iowa the land above Raccoon Fork, placed it technically in what is called a state of reservation. That reservation has never been removed, either by the Interior Department or by act of Congress, and because the land is in this state of reservation the officers of this local land office are not authorized, and refuse, to accept the filing of homestead or pre-emption settlers. That is the reason. It is simply that the question may be presented in the courts. It is proposed to relieve these lands from reservation, declaring them to be public land so far as Congress has that power. That will compel the officers at Des Moines and Sioux City, and also at the Department of the Interior, to recognize the claims of settlers; and if the officers of the land office refuse, then a mandamus will lie under the common law to recognize them.

Mr. PARKER. Why, does not the gentleman understand that in the Litchfield case it was held that these lands in controversy belong to the navigation company?

Mr. PAYSON. No, sir; the Supreme Court not only did not decide that question, but let me say to the gentleman that it was not presented in the Litchfield case.

That was a contest between Litchfield on the one hand and the navigation company on the other, and the case was submitted on an agreed state of facts, where both agreed that the lands had been duly certified to the State of Iowa, that they had been duly sold by the State of Iowa, under the joint rules of 1861, to the navigation company; when the fact is the lands never were properly certified to the State of Iowa, and the navigation company never had become the purchaser from the State of Iowa for value; and because of that agreed state of facts the Supreme Court decided, as between Litchfield and the navigation company, that the title of the navigation company was valid. But that was the extent of the decision.

Mr. PARKER. And this bill now comes in and seeks to escape the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. PAYSON. Not at all. As I said to the gentleman before, that question was not presented in that decision in any form.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMES. Was any case ever tried or decided in the United States courts in which the question whether the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company complied with the conditions of the grant was raised?

Mr. PARKER. I am not able to state that there was.

Mr. HOLMES. No, sir; there never has been any such case decided.

Mr. PARKER. My understanding of the situation is that a large number of people have gone upon these lands which ostensibly and apparently are under the control of this navigation company through the State of Iowa, and that the owners of the land are unable even to go upon the premises to view them.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon; that is entirely a mistake. The people entered upon these lands under authority of the Government and paid their money in many instances, took possession, and some have had them for twenty-five years from the Government.

Mr. PARKER. I will give one single instance of the methods which have been adopted in reference to these lands, and I refer to a speech now of Senator Lapham, of New York, delivered in the last session of the last Congress, in which he shows the manner of some of these people.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from New York allow a suggestion?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is it not true that Senator Lapham admitted in the course of that debate that he was practically representing the attorneys for this navigation company?

Mr. PARKER. No, sir. Senator Lapham stated that he represented the parties who represented the interests of his dead friend General Martindale, whose interests and whose estate had been robbed by settlers on the Des Moines lands.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. His speech was the speech of an attorney of that corporation.

Mr. PARKER. His speech was a speech delivered in his representative capacity and on his responsibility as a Senator from the State of New York. In that speech he used this language:

> I was considering yesterday at the close of what I said the question of the condition of these lands in the possession of settlers in the Des Moines Valley. They are by no manner of means the thrifty and enterprising population so eloquently described by the honorable Senator from Iowa. They cultivate their farms very indifferently. The purchasers under the river grant have been paying the taxes since 1861; the settlers pay no taxes. When General Martindale, whose case I mentioned yesterday, went to one of the occupants of a portion of the land which had been conveyed to him, he entered into a contract with him for the sale of the lot at a reasonable price. The occupant then said to General Martindale: "I have no means with which to cultivate this land, and I want you to make me a loan of $150 to enable me to get a team and needed farming implements." The general very kindly and liberally made him the loan of $150 and entered into a contract with him for the purchase of the property. In less than three years that man joined the Settlers' Union, as it is called, the organization to which I shall refer by and by, and he has never refunded the money or paid a farthing upon his contract, and remains in possession to this day. He has repudiated his obligations. That, under the inspiration of this organization, is the character mainly of the occupants of those lands in that part of the State.

This incident throws a light upon the whole controversy and indicates the position in which the occupants of these lands stand to the Des Moines River Company, and therefore I assert that this is an act which will tend to disturb the title of the real owners of these lands and which is attempting to continue litigation, which is carried on, as I understand it, by subscription of the valley occupants——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Subscriptions made by farmers who entered, at the invitation of the Government, these lands, located upon them, and have sent delegations of their own class, farmers—who have been knocking at the doors of Congress for several years—not paid attorneys, not lobbyists, but representing the men themselves who have been deprived of their homes; and twice before, in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, the House put this bill through with no opposing vote, except in one case two from the State of New York. That is all the lobby there was to get the bill through.

Mr. PARKER. Does not the gentleman from Iowa know that $100,000 was raised at one time to pay the attorneys of these "farmers?"

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No, sir; and my friend from New York does not know it. If there has been a fund of $100,000 here it has been in the interest of the heirs of General Martindale, and not in the interest of the farmers, who could not raise that amount of money to save their souls.

Mr. STRUBLE. I wish to ask my friend from New York a question.

Mr. PARKER. I desire to take care of one at a time. I assert in answer to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], I am informed from sources I believe that a fund of something like $100,000 was raised at that time, that the attorneys representing this company haunted this Capitol at another session of Congress, and that the contest grew so sharp and severe at the close of the last Congress that the leading attorney representing these men went insane and died here from the disappointment caused by Senator Lapham contesting the case and carrying it to a point that under the rule the bill was defeated. Is not that so?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No, sir; and I call upon the gentleman to give the name of the man who said there were $100,000 here for that purpose. And let me tell the gentleman the man did not die insane. He died in the bath-house opposite the Riggs House taking a Turkish bath, and he was as sane before he entered the bath-room as the gentleman from New York. There has never been in either Chamber of the American Congress a representative of Iowa who did not stand up at the behest of his own conscience and the demands of the farmers who have been robbed of their homes to favor this legislation, and if there has been any fund raised here in the interest of this legislation it has been from sources that could afford to raise it, and the representatives of Iowa are ignorant of it, and will be pleased to have the gentleman from New York give the name of his informant.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman from New York indulge me to ask a question?

Mr. PARKER. Not at present. I can only deal with one at a time. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] misapprehends me. I did not state or suggest that any fund was raised to meet this contest. I stated what I believed to be well known, that in a previous Congress to meet the general contest in the courts and the expense of pressing through a bill here a large fund was raised, something like $100,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does not the gentleman know that a member of this House from an Eastern State was expelled years ago for having received a bribe in connection with this very matter?

Mr. PARKER. That I leave the gentleman to settle with the gentleman he attacks. I do not know his name or the circumstances.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Tell us all about the fund.

Mr. HOLMES. How about the $1,000 that was confessed by the company as having been used by them for the purpose of furthering the passage of the navigation bill through Congress?

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. Gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. PARKER. I shall not object to these interruptions, as I wish to convince the House there is something here that needs their attention.

The SPEAKER. It is important to have order in the House. Gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection, as I have said, to these interruptions, as they show to the House there is a controversy in this matter which has two sides to it. The excellent gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has put this forward here as though it were a railroad bill, a bill carrying the right of the committee to claim the attention of the House whenever it sees fit. He has reported the bill this morning, and places it on its immediate passage. This is a Senate bill. I suppose it has been considered in the committee of the House.

Mr. PAYSON. It has, and it is unanimously reported by that committee with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PARKER. Therefore I wished to satisfy the House there was a matter of controversy here; and those who care to look the matter up should have an opportunity to do so, if they desire, before the vote is taken. The manner in which my friends from Iowa come forward in defense of the Des Moines settlers and the interests they represent will suggest there is a controversy here that really and fairly demands the attention of the House.

Now, a few words as to this bill. After providing that all the lands improperly certified—without other specification—shall be declared to be public lands of the United States, the bill says:

Provided further, That the claims of all persons who with intent in good faith to obtain title thereto under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States entered or remained upon any tract of said land prior to January, 1880, not exceeding 160 acres, are hereby confirmed and made valid in them, their heirs, or their proper assigns.

That is, however they went upon these lands, and whoever those lands belonged to, whether they belonged to the navigation company or whether they belonged to the United States, if they went or remained upon these lands, not exceeding 160 acres, they are confirmed, and their title is made valid. Is this the method of those who are only seeking their rights in good faith?

Again they say:

Provided further, That the titles of all bona fide claimants under color of title from the State of Iowa and its grantees, or the United States and its grantees, which do not come in conflict with the persons who, with intent in good faith to obtain title thereto under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States, settled upon said lands prior to January, 1880, are confirmed and made valid.

Here are two classes of landholders, merely in possession, whose titles are to be confirmed and made valid as against the decisions of the courts, so far as that can be done by this bill.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman yield there a moment?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. Is not the gentleman himself in favor of that proviso which he has just read?

Mr. PARKER. Perhaps that should be adopted if the other is.

Mr. PAYSON. But, in any event, is not the gentleman himself in favor of that proviso?

Mr. PARKER. I am opposed to the whole bill.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. PARKER. My answer covers the gentleman's question.

Mr. PAYSON. If the gentleman will permit me a word, that provision is intended as a confirmation of title to the grantees of the parties whom the gentleman from New York represents upon this floor, and it makes the confirmation in express terms.

Mr. PARKER. It is not in any wise satisfactory to the grantees or to any of the parties who have any interest under this bill.

Mr. PAYSON. It is satisfactory to Mr. Litchfield and his attorney, Mr. Martindale.

Mr. PARKER. I do not know whether Mr. Litchfield is satisfied with this bill or not. I never saw him.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Well, I can tell you that he is not.

Mr. PARKER. But I do know that parties who reside in my district, who put their money into the Des Moines River improvement, who understood that they bought lands and paid for them, and received all the title that could be given, yet who, when they visit there, are not able to go upon their own lands on account of the rifles that are pointed at them—I know that they do not want this proviso, which would take their lands and give them to people who were at first merely squatters, who have continued in that character from that time to this, and to whose titles this legislation seeks to give validity as against the repeated decisions of the courts.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] please inform the House whether the Des Moines Navigation Company, or the gentlemen claiming to own these lands, did ever improve the navigation of the Des Moines River to the extent of one foot or ever gave the people of Iowa one cent of real value for these lands? That is the real question before us and that is what this House wants to know.

Mr. PARKER. I understand that the settlement and adjustment entered into by the State of Iowa recognized the fact that they had made improvement, so that they were entitled to be paid and were paid accordingly.

Mr. HOLMES. The gentleman knows that that was without any action by Congress and in violation of the act of Congress.

Mr. PARKER. Was it not done by the State of Iowa?

Mr. HOLMES. True; but what has that to do with the action of Congress?

Mr. PARKER. Are you here denouncing your own State in the interest of these Des Moines settlers?

Mr. HOLMES. Our State has repeatedly asked of Congress action in this matter which would go far beyond anything contained in this bill.

Mr. PARKER. Has the State of Iowa been corrupt in its action?

Mr. HOLMES. No, sir.

Mr. PARKER. Then stand by what it did, and do as you agreed to do, and not come here with a proposition based upon a local political clamor and ask to have the repeated decisions of the courts overturned.

Mr. HOLMES. If any officer of the State of Iowa, or any other person, was corrupted I do not stand by him or by that action; but I say again that the people of my State have repeatedly asked Congress to grant relief going far beyond that which is provided in this bill.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I have now reached a point where the representation of the district to which this bill relates treats the matter with respectable and respectful consideration. That is certainly something gained. [Laughter.] This bill was sprung upon us this morning without notice or any expectation that it would be here. The report of the committee came into my hands only three or four days ago, and no one had a right to expect that the bill would be up for discussion at this time. It covers a vast field, as every lawyer will see who gives the subject any attention. I have not looked at the points involved or refreshed my mind in regard to them for more than a year, and I have never before had occasion to debate them. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in fairness this bill should be postponed until it can receive more deliberate consideration, and that we should not have it driven through under the previous question here this morning when we are waiting for more important business.

Mr. PAYSON. A single word, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the statement just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] as to this bill being hastily sprung upon the House. The report was submitted to the House on the 13th day of February; therefore it has been in the hands of members for eleven days.

As to the other point, that the State of Iowa has been acting improperly in reference to this matter, let me say that the State of Iowa has never, either directly or indirectly, recognized the claims of the Des Moines Navigation Company to an acre of this land above the mouth of the Raccoon Fork. There never has been even an indirect recognition on the part of the State of Iowa of the right of that company to an acre of that land above that point. In fact, the deed under which the navigation company claims is in form only a quitclaim deed, and only purports to convey to the navigation company the lands which were granted to the State of Iowa, and, as I said before, the Supreme Court has decided that the lands which were granted to the State of Iowa are those below the forks.

In addition to that, when the settlement known as the Harvey settlement, to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] has referred, was made, the claims of the navigation company never entered into consideration, directly or indirectly; and when the act of 1861 was passed validating the titles and forbidding trespass upon these lands, the debates both in this House and in the Senate show that all the parties who were then contemplated by that validation were those who were purchasers from the State of Iowa to the amount of 55,000 acres of land, upon which they were then settled. It was only when ingenious lawyers came into the case, and when, with the promise of a fee and the hope of reward, a construction was placed upon that act extending the terms of the deed of 1858—it was then for the first time that the claim was presented in behalf of the navigation company that they had a right to these lands above the forks, upon which settlers had gone, many of them holding the patents of the Government of the United States for twenty-five years past.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. In some cases for thirty years.

Mr. PAYSON. Some of those settlers have had the patents of this Government for thirty years, as I am informed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], and, as the records in our committee-room show, others have had such patents for twenty-five years, and have been resting there in fancied security as against the claims now represented on this floor by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER. What legislation of this kind do men want who have been in possession of the land and have held patents for it from the United States for a quarter of a century? What reason is there why they should want any legislation of this kind?

Mr. PAYSON. It is easy enough to answer the gentleman's question, but to do it I shall have to sing the same old song over again.

Mr. PARKER. I have heard it a good many times.

Mr. PAYSON. The reason is that whenever their entries were recognized by the local land office, the lands having been in a state of "reservation" under the action of the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Stuart, the courts would not recognize the right of pre-emption or homestead settlement upon them.

And the gentleman from New York knows as well as I know that when a patent is issued by the Secretary of the Interior and signed by the President in a case where those officers have no authority to act it is absolutely void. Every lawyer knows that in such a case the patent is not worth the paper on which it is written.

Mr. PARKER. Then the very patents which you boast these men have held for twenty-five years are not worth the paper on which they are written.

Mr. PAYSON. They are not. But these men being in possession of this land as bona fide settlers under the public-land laws, this bill will sweep away the cobweb which is technically in the way of their perfecting their titles, and will give them a standing which the courts will be bound to recognize.

Now, if any gentleman desires to ask any question——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The gentleman will allow me to say that some of these poor people who have had their patents for twenty-five years have absolutely in a state of sickness and destitution been thrown out in the inclement Iowa winter. They now come here and simply ask the privilege of going into the courts to show that they have a bona fide title to the lands on which they have been settled for years and have raised their families.

Mr. PARKER. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] to yield me one minute.

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER. I wish to say that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] must certainly be in error as to these people being "thrown out;" for I am told that the Settlers' Union prevents by force of arms any owner or agent of an owner from going upon those lands.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Not at all. The Settlers' Union is not for that purpose. It is simply for the purpose of having their case properly presented to Congress and asking for relief where they have a right under the law to ask it.

Mr. PARKER. If that is their legitimate purpose, I must say that they have their case presented here with superior energy.

Mr. STRUBLE. In the statement just made by the gentleman from New York as to the course of the Settlers' Union, he is just as much mistaken as he was in saying that $100,000 had been raised by these poor fellows, who, in some cases, have had to borrow money on which to subsist till the next year.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman state to me the amount they did raise?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let me say to the gentleman from New York, in reference to the "energy" with which the case of these people is presented, that it is an "energy" which finds its birth in reasons that ought to touch the heart of every lawmaker in this Hall.

Mr. PARKER. I have no doubt the gentleman so regards it. There is a home political influence behind it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. None, sir.

Mr. PARKER. Now, do not use up any more of my time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It is used up already. You are now talking by the courtesy of the House, as I am.

Mr. PARKER. Exactly; and I always receive the courtesy of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And always will.

Mr. PARKER. Thank you. Now, I wish merely to say one word more. The litigation which this bill proposes to authorize, instead of giving these men any rights that will be permanent or will inhere in a permanent title, simply places these parties where, with their attorneys ahead of them, they can occupy two or three years more in getting a case to the Supreme Court of the United States and then waiting three years more till the case is reached, thus giving them five or six years of "breathing-spell." In the mean time, the men who really own the land will be compelled to pay the taxes upon it, while these people will occupy the lands, have the benefit of the crops, and be able to divide the proceeds with their attorneys, matters going on as they have gone on.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The payment of the taxes is all that is done by these non-occupying claimants. Now, will the gentleman from New York allow me a single question?

Mr. PAYSON. I do not yield further.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. There is a great deal said about attorneys' fees and "political influence." What "political influence" touches the gentleman from New York in this matter?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] insists on his right to the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from New York answer that question?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly; I will do so with a great deal of pleasure, if the gentleman from Illinois will give me half a minute.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PAYSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] that he may answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. PARKER. I will very cheerfully state in reply to my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] that the parties whom I represent are named Chapman and reside in Morristown, in my district. They, with others—and they especially—put a large amount of money, under the laws of the United States and in accordance with the request of the State of Iowa, in this Des Moines River improvement.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then they are moneyed men.

Mr. PARKER. They are constituents of mine, and I appear for them.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And they have "political influence" in your district.

Mr. PARKER. Some. [Laughter.] All respectable men have political influence.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Why did you not put that in before?

Mr. PARKER. You kept asking questions.

Mr. STRUBLE. Those poor Des Moines River people, have they "influence?"

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Not one of those men is in my district.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] yielded one half minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER], and it has expired.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman did not get his half minute. I can certify to that. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYSON. I demand the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I submit to the rules of the House.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. PAYSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HERBERT. I move the adoption of the substitute.

IDAHO AND WASHINGTON TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills under the rule begins at ten minutes to 2 o'clock. When the hour expired yesterday there was under consideration a bill called up by the Committee on Territories, the title of which will be read.

The clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2889) to annex a portion of the Territory of Idaho to Washington Territory.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the adoption of the second amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Washington Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ILLINOIS AND MISSISSIPPI RIVER CANAL.

The Committee on Railways and Canals was called.

Mr. MURPHY. I am instructed by the Committee on Railways and Canals to call up the bill (H. R. 5869) to provide for the acceptance by the United States of the proposed grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and all its appurtenances, from the State of Illinois, and for the construction of the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill, as it involves an appropriation.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair), and proceeded to consider the bill H. R. 5869, which is as follows:

Whereas the General Assembly of the State of Illinois has passed an act providing, among other things, that the Illinois and Michigan Canal, in said State, its right of way, and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State may have in any real estate heretofore ceded to the State by the United States for canal purposes, should be ceded to the United States on the conditions and for the purposes named in said act; and

Whereas said act, approved April 28, 1882, was submitted to a vote of the people of said State at a general election held in November, 1882, in pursuance of said act and as required by the constitution of said State, at which election said act was approved by a majority of all the votes polled at such election, and proclamation thereof duly made by the governor of said State; and

Whereas the General Assembly of said State has not withdrawn or revoked said grant; and

Whereas the interests of commerce require that said canal shall be owned, enlarged, and controlled by the Government of the United States: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said grant of said canal, its right of way, and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, or interest which the State may now have in any real estate heretofore ceded to said State by the United States, be, and are hereby, accepted on the terms and conditions specified in said act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to construct a canal from the Illinois River, at or near the town of Hennepin, in the State of Illinois, to the Mississippi River, at or above the mouth of Rock River, in said State; and also a branch canal or feeder from said Rock River to the main line of said canal. Said canal and branch canal or feeder shall be known as the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, and shall be constructed on such route as has been heretofore surveyed by the Secretary of War in pursuance of the provisions of the act of Congress passed August 2, 1882, and entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," known as the Rock Island or Rock River route in said survey.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in order to secure the right of way for such canal and branch, to acquire the title to such lands as may be necessary by agreement, purchase, or voluntary conveyance from the owners, if it can be done on reasonable terms; but if that shall be found impracticable, then the Secretary of War shall apply at any term of the circuit or district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois to be held thereafter, at any general or special term held in said district, and in the name of the United States institute and carry on proceedings to condemn such lands as may be necessary for right of way as aforesaid; and in such proceedings said court shall be governed by the laws of the State of Illinois, so far as the same may be applicable to the subject of condemning private property for public use.

SEC. 4. That said canal or feeder shall be 80 feet wide at the water line and 7 feet deep, the locks 170 feet in length and 30 feet in width, and with a capacity for vessels of at least 280 tons burden, with guard-gates, waste-weirs, locks, lock-houses, basins, bridges, and all other erections and fixtures that may be necessary for safe and convenient navigation of said canal and branch as specified in said survey.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War shall cause said work to be commenced as soon as practicable, and within six months after this act goes into effect; and he shall cause said work to be constructed in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of this act, and of permanent and substantial materials and in good, workmanlike manner: Provided, That Congress may at any time regulate, fix, and determine the tolls and charges to be imposed upon said improvement when completed.

SEC. 6. That the sum of $1,000,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act relating to the canal connecting the Illinois River, at or near the town of Hennepin, with the Mississippi River, at or above the mouth of Rock River.

Mr. MURPHY addressed the committee for some time, when

The CHAIRMAN (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) announced that the hour for the consideration of bills had expired, and under the rule the committee would now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5869) to provide for the acceptance by the United States of the proposed grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and all its appurtenances, from the State of Illinois, and for the construction of the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, had come to no resolution thereon.

DEBATE ON COINAGE BILL.

Mr. JAMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to ask unanimous consent for the consideration and adoption of the resolution which I sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, March 2, after the hour for the consideration of bills, the House proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 5090, for the coinage of silver, and other purposes, and that said bill be considered from day to day until disposed of, not interfering with revenue and general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to make an inquiry. If that resolution is adopted, when that day is reached will not this order exclude all other business except revenue and appropriation bills until the close of the session?

The SPEAKER. If it is called up it will.

Mr. BURROWS. If called up it will close out all other bills during the session except revenue and appropriation bills.

Mr. JAMES. It is the intention of the committee, after the discussion has gone on for some days, to give notice that the previous question will be moved so as to close the debate.

Mr. BURROWS. But the House may not order the previous question. Unless the order can be limited to some time I shall have to object.

Mr. JAMES. We have no objection to limiting the time if such is the wish of the House. It is a question which the House wants to consider. The committee have come unanimously to the conclusion that it is desirable to follow the course indicated in the resolution, and have directed me to ask its adoption. But if the House desires to limit the time it can do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COLE. I object.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference. I ask it at this time because a bill upon a kindred subject, the erection of a public building, is now pending before a committee of Congress, and I desire that this bill may be considered at the same time, as antagonizing the propositions contained in the other bill.

Mr. BEACH. I shall have to object, Mr. Speaker. A great many other gentlemen have similar bills, and we can not give consent to one gentleman without giving it to all.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection to the resolution presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. STEELE. I shall object, Mr. Speaker, unless the time is fixed for closing the debate.

Mr. JAMES. We will take one week, then.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] proposes to modify the resolution submitted by him this morning so as to continue the consideration of the bill in question for one week. With that modification of the resolution is there still objection?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills for raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAMMOND). The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering revenue bills. The Clerk will report the unfinished business.

The unfinished business was a bill (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this bill was called up on the 19th of January, if I remember rightly, and about twenty minutes devoted to its consideration, when an amendment was offered providing for the payment of any tax assessed in standard silver dollars. That amendment was considered from time to time for a week or two, but nothing was said in regard to the merits of the bill. The amendment was out of order, but the point was not made, as certain gentlemen desired to submit observations upon the propriety of repealing the Bland act.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be proper for the Chair to state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] that he himself occupied thirty minutes in the discussion of this bill when he had the floor before and has but thirty minutes remaining.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am aware of that, and I would not claim the attention of the House now but for the fact that when this bill was called up before it was in the evening, and there were but few members present.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to the provisions of this bill, its origin and its purpose, and to show, if I can, that the desired object can be accomplished without doing the injustice to a great industry which the bill will do if passed just as it is reported by the committee.

I do not care to go into a discussion of the whisky business in detail or to give a history of distilling or to enumerate the different kinds and brands of whisky, nor shall I seek to entertain the House by reviewing the history of revenue legislation in this country; but a few words with reference to the taxation of distilled spirits are absolutely necessary that the effect of this bill may be clearly understood.

As you are all aware, a great part of the revenue of this nation is raised by a tax on distilled spirits. You are also aware that contrary to the usage in reference to every other article that is taxed, and contrary to the usage of every other nation, the tax upon this article is collected before the article goes into consumption. You are also aware that the tax levied is 600 per cent. more than the original cost of the spirits.

The amount of the tax due is determined by a gauge of the distilled spirits taken as soon as the spirits are drawn off from the distillery cisterns. The amount ascertained to be in each barrel is taxed 90 cents per proof gallon. A law passed some fifteen years ago provided that wherever in gauging the contents of a barrel it was ascertained that there was more than a half-gallon in excess of the number of full gallons that fraction of a gallon should be taxed as a whole gallon, while if the fraction was less than half a gallon no account should be taken of it; in other words, it was to be exempt from taxation.

That provision was adopted for the purpose of securing thoroughly fair play between the Government and the distiller. It was presumed that there would be about as many fractions over the half-gallon as under, and that therefore this arrangement would be fair to both the Government and the distiller. In practical experience, however, it was ascertained that the distiller was enabled to bring the fraction beneath the half-gallon every time, and thereby to exempt the fraction in every case from taxation.

You may ask, "Why should the distiller not be taxed for that half-gallon?" So he ought, if he gets the half-gallon; so he ought, if he has any use of the half-gallon; so he ought, if he is able to sell the half-gallon; so he ought, if anything short of omnipresence could find the half-gallon. But the fact is that the distiller does not receive, does not use, does not sell that half-gallon. It is absolutely lost to him; and it is neither the plan nor the purpose of this Government, nor is it honest, to tax a man for that which he does not have, can not use, and can not sell. Such is the policy of the Government. In view of that fact the Commissioner of Internal Revenue declined to ask Congress to provide for taxing that odd half-gallon for the reason that every distiller in the country loses much more than the half-gallon on each barrel of spirits he produces. In other words, when the distilled spirits are drawn off by a Government gauger and put into barrels the loss by soakage and leakage always exceeds half a gallon. I have here a statement from prominent distillers and handlers of distilled spirits, showing that the loss in handling these goods, in taking them to the rectifying-house and putting them upon the market, is not half a gallon, which would be a little more than 1 per cent. of the contents of a barrel, but is in fact 3½ per cent.

Therefore the Commissioner of Internal Revenue recognized that it was not just to tax the distiller for this fraction, because it is not the purpose of the Government to tax him for more than he puts into the barrel and is enabled to take to the warehouse and sell and deliver to the purchaser. Every man here must see that to tax the distiller on what he does not get is palpably unjust; and it is against this injustice that I am bearing my testimony now. I do not ask on behalf of any distiller in my district or in this country that he shall be exempted from paying tax to the last poor scruple upon every gill of distilled spirits which he gets and handles and controls. Recognizing the justice of this allowance to the distiller, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has not asked until recently that Congress interpose any legislation against this allowance of the fraction of a gallon.

Upon this subject I must necessarily repeat some things I said on a previous day, since a great many are here now who were not then present. In 1881, in what was known as the Carlisle bill, we authorized that which was not theretofore permitted, the drawing of distilled spirits in packages of 10 gallons. What has been the result? Some distillers have availed themselves of the opportunity to get the advantage of the half-gallon on that small package. While this was fairly against the spirit of the law, it was not against its letter. But there has arisen this abuse of claiming the fraction on the 10-gallon packages, and it is this abuse the Internal Revenue Department seeks to correct. It does not seek to work an injustice; it does not seek to take away the small measure of justice which resulted from the passage of the law as it stood prior to 1881, as it has stood for fifteen years, and as it stands to-day. Now gentlemen will readily see that if by an amendment we can correct this abuse and thereby save to the distillers and those interested in every part of the country, the protection resulting from a just provision of law, it ought to be done.

But some one says to me, "Why is it that the Committee on Ways and Means has reported unanimously this bill without the amendment?" Well, to quote Scripture, I might say to the committee, "Ye did run well; who did hinder you?" Who knew that such a bill was pending before the Ways and Means Committee? Who that was interested in this matter had any information about it one way or the other? No man on this floor interested in resisting the unjust feature of this bill—not intended to be unjust, of course, but none the less unjust in its practical operation—knew anything about this measure before it was reported? If to-day this bill were pending before the Ways and Means Committee there would be, in my humble judgment, no difficulty in reaching a just measure which would correct the abuse as I propose to correct it, or otherwise, and at the same time, preserve to the distillers the measure of justice which the law as it now stands secures to them.

Let me call attention to another matter: I have been speaking of the effect of this bill as it relates to what is known as high-wine distillers In Kentucky and other localities they make what is known as Bourbon whisky. It is a table beverage. That kind of spirit, that is, the Bourbon whisky, is prepared for market by aging; in other words, it is drawn from the still, taken into the warehouse, and there, by aging, the fusel oil passes off and the liquor becomes what connoisseurs call "mellow" and full of cheer. Now in view of the fact that the distillers of Bourbon whisky lose largely in the process of aging, what did Congress do as a measure of even-handed justice? By a measure for which four out of every five members of the House voted it was provided that the distillers should be allowed upon spirits stored in a distillery warehouse 1 gallon for every sixty days up to three years, the greatest allowance being 7½ gallons. That measure was just and right, because the distillers sustained the loss. Now the people who make high wines ask for a similar measure of justice, but justice in a smaller degree.

I only ask in behalf of my constituents and the distillers of this country that while correcting the abuse they do not do a great wrong to that industry. I am aware there are some in the House who think it is a good thing to kick the business wherever there is an opportunity. This is a business transaction. It is the great Government of the United States dealing with an industry that has paid into the coffers of the country hundreds of millions of dollars. It is a question of dealing with it fairly, justly, and not having our judgments perverted or diverted by reason of the fact that we are dealing with distilled spirits.

I have talked, Mr. Chairman, not with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but with the acting commissioner and Mr. Cushing, both reliable men. They have not had time to consider the proposition I have submitted in reference to correcting the abuse I am speaking of, and which resulted from the use of the 10-gallon packages. You will observe that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in his report suggests the Government loses $200,000 a year on these fractional half-gallons. Why, certainly, theoretically it does; and if we should tax them on a gallon and a half more than they get there will be that much additional revenue placed in the coffers of the nation, but it would be an unjust exaction. All I complain of is, you are taxing what the distiller does not get. There is not a distiller in America, I do not care who or where, but knows and will testify to the House that he loses more than the fraction of a gallon now exempt from tax.

To do away with this abuse I shall offer, Mr. Chairman, and shall consider for a moment this amendment. I am perfectly aware that the House has not had the opportunity, and probably will not have the opportunity, to consider this question as fully and carefully as it deserves; but the amendment I offer not only puts us back to the old law, where there was no chance for fraud, but it goes beyond it for abundant security. Whereas the old law, before the distillers were permitted to use 10-gallon packages, authorized them to use 20-gallon packages, I have by this amendment remitted them to 30-gallon casks. In other words, in drawing off spirits that they shall not be drawn off in any cask or package containing less than 30 gallons. I will read the amendment. I hold in my hand the statute which provided that distilled spirits should be drawn off under the supervision of the gauger—that is, under the supervision of the Government—in packages of not less than 20 wine-gallons' capacity.

We subsequently modified the law with a view to promoting the South American trade. By the modification which was embodied in the Carlisle bill we authorized distillers to draw off into 10-gallon packages. I am not clear the South American trade amounted to a great deal; whether it did or not I do not know, but at all events, in order that there may be no ground for the Committee on Ways and Means to stand upon, in order that the abuse at which they aim in this bill may be corrected, and at the same time no wrong done to those engaged in this industry, I offer this amendment which I will read. I propose to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following. I beg the attention of gentlemen to see whether or not, and I call the attention of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to it—whether or not this does not correct the abuse, while retaining to the distillers the right to which they are entitled and which they have been enjoying for fifteen years.

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: "SECTION 1. That section 5 of the act entitled an act to amend the laws in relation to internal revenue, approved May 28, 1880, be amended by striking out the word 'ten,' wherever the same occurs in said section, and inserting in lieu of it 'thirty.'"

So the section will read—and I beg the attention of the House to it:

All distilled spirits shall be drawn from the receiving cistern into casks or packages of not less capacity than 30 wine gallons, &c.

The law is now 10. It was, prior to the Carlisle bill, 20. I have made it 30, so out of abundant caution there may be no chance for any suggestion even of fraud on the revenue.

This section fixes the size of the casks. What is the result? Instead of the bill, as proposed, compelling distillers to pay on spirits that do not exist in tangible shape, that they can not use, never sell; in other words, instead of doing these men a rank injustice, it does them justice while it provides for doing justice to the Government. The section which provides for taxing fractional parts of a gallon is section 3251 Revised Statutes, which simply provides, in drawing off into casks or packages, wherever a fraction of a gallon exceeds one-half it shall be taxed as a whole gallon.

Wherever the fractional part of a gallon is less than one-half it shall be exempt from taxation. Now, there being an absolute loss to the distillers of the fraction which is exempt, and I have heard no testimony to the contrary, it is simply absurd to say that the distiller gets a half-gallon of spirits upon which he evades payment of tax. Theoretically he gets the fraction, practically he does not, and it is at present exempt from tax because he does not get it.

Mr. Chairman, there is another amendment proposed by the distillers, and to which I think the consideration of the Internal Revenue Department has been called. The loss to distillers by soakage, &c., is ascertained to exceed 1 per cent. of the contents of each barrel. The amendment, and it might be more acceptable to the honorable gentlemen in charge of this bill, provides for allowing the exemption of fractional part of a gallon as now authorized by law, provided such allowance in no case exceeds 1 per cent. of the wine-gallon contents of the package.

If that be more satisfactory, I am content with it. But I am here to call the attention of the House to the fact that an abuse against the spirit, not the letter of the law, but against its spirit, can be corrected, and in a very simple way, without doing a great wrong, and I hope it may please our friends upon the committee to adopt it. I submit to my honorable friend from Illinois whether or not it does not accomplish precisely what he desires to accomplish, and what the Commissioner of Internal Revenue desired to accomplish when he suggested the measure to the House, or rather to the committee.

One word further, Mr. Chairman, and I will yield to my friend from Illinois. In talking with the Internal Revenue Department, I find that the complaints which have called the attention of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the necessity for legislative action in this matter grew out of the use, or rather the abuse, of the 10-gallon-package system. Nobody, so far as I am informed, hinted that the exemption of a fraction under a half-gallon was unjust when applied to the barrel package, or that the allowance more than covered the actual loss the distiller sustained. Now, again let me say that I hope my honorable friends upon the committee will be content to accept the remedy I propose, which permits no injustice to the Government and accomplishes all that is, or at least all that is sought to be, accomplished—that is, to correct an abuse. Other gentlemen desire to be heard, and therefore I will for the present yield the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MCCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendments a bill and joint resolution of the House of Representatives of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 3829) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 71) authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension building.

It also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, a bill (H. R. 327) to enable national banking associations to increase their capital stock and to change their names and locations.

It further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 23) giving a military record to Thomas Miller;

A bill (S. 91) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant the right of way for a railroad and telegraph line through the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians to the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 333) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas; and

A bill (S. 1634) authorizing the President of the United States to grant permission to one or more officers of the Army to accept temporary service under the Government of Corea.

TAX ON FRACTIONAL PARTS OF GALLON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read the report accompanying this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under existing laws "any fractional part of a gallon of distilled spirits amounting to one-half gallon or over in a cask or package shall be taxed as a gallon, and any fractional part of a gallon less than one-half gallon in any cask or package shall be exempt from tax."

This statute is based on the assumption that the fractions taxed and untaxed would balance each other.

In practice it has occurred that the tax-payer, to avail himself of the advantages which this statute affords, frequently used small packages with fractional parts of gallons less than half a gallon. It is estimated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that by this process the fractional parts of a gallon which go untaxed exceed those which are taxed by 500,000 in a single year, entailing a loss in the collection of this tax of a sum estimated to exceed $200,000, and adds much to the cost of collecting the revenue.

To remedy these and other evils, and to secure a better collection of the revenue, your committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, the report of the committee just read states with substantial accuracy the purpose of the bill under consideration. Its purpose is to compel payment at the time fixed by law, and at the rate fixed by law, on all distilled spirits made and removed or taken away from the distillery warehouse and out of the control of the Government by the owner. During the first six years of the existence of this law putting a tax on distilled spirits, or from 1862 to 1868, in which time of six years the tax was sometimes as high as $2 and at others as low as 20 cents per gallon, the tax was collected directly in money.

We had not then adopted the method of collecting the tax through the stamp system. Then the spirits were gauged, which is another name for measuring, the quantity ascertained, and the tax paid at the rate per gallon or parts of a gallon fixed by the law. In 1868 the tax was fixed at 50 cents per gallon, and the system of collecting through the stamp system adopted. It being impracticable to have a stamp of the size of every fractional part of a gallon, it was enacted that not only gallons but fractional parts of gallons should pay the full 50 cents tax. This, although complained of by the distillers, was the law, and remained in force for four years, when in 1872 the tax was raised to 70, and afterward to 90 cents. In 1872 it was still considered impracticable to provide stamps to correspond with the size of the various fractional parts of gallons, and it was determined to exempt from taxation parts of a gallon less than one-half and tax the fractional part if in excess of a half-gallon at the rate of a full gallon.

When this was done it was supposed that from day to day, month to month, year to year, the manufacturers would, as it might happen, sometimes put a fraction more or greater than one-half gallon and sometimes less in a cask, barrel, or other package; that the two would about offset or equalize each other, so that at the end of the year, or of a given or stated time, the quantity taxed would be as near as might be equal to the whole quantity made and taken away or withdrawn from the warehouse by the owner. It was some considerable time before the violations of this law were very flagrant, but later it was discovered that all or nearly all the fractions were less than half-gallons and escaped taxation; that this was not the result of chance, but was a contrivance to avoid the payment of a legitimate tax. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue reports that in the last year this abuse, or, if I may use a stronger term, this fraud, had so grown that in the very last year the packages which were less than a half-gallon and escaped taxation outnumbered those which were greater and were taxed by 500,000. The loss of revenue to the Treasury by this failure to account for and pay legal taxes amounted to not less than a quarter of a million of dollars, estimated on the statement of the Commissioner.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] tells us that these parts of gallons less than a half-gallon were to be left untaxed as a compensation or allowance for loss by leakage, which, he says, is inevitable; that this was only justice, for the loss far exceeded the allowance or amount allowed. What measure of justice was that which let one part of a gallon escape a tax and doubled it on the other? Any losses resulting to one are common to both. It was simply for purposes of convenience. This method was adopted, its authors supposing that it could and would be honestly enforced and that the parts of gallons would be greater or less as might happen, and as the casks might be made, without any design to defraud the Government.

Nor is the loss of revenue the only or the greatest evil that results from this abuse. By using smaller packages, casks, or barrels—packages of 10 gallons' measure—which are extensively used by many manufacturers or distillers, the crafty and less scrupulous have often escaped, do continually avoid, the payment of taxes on the quantity of spirits contained in a single barrel amounting to $1.75, which the honest maker and the man who honestly pays his tax has to account for. This is such an advantage in favor of the unscrupulous as the upright and honest tax-payer can not compete with or contend against.

This is an invitation to trickery, because the fair dealer can not be on equal terms in business. He must abandon distilling or resort to the same ingenious rascalities practiced by his rival or competitor in business. The result is this tax-escaping contrivance grows from year to year, and will as long as this abuse finds its indemnity in the wording or terms of the law. If one distiller puts 42 gallons in a barrel and pays the tax on it, another distiller who puts 10 gallons and nearly a half in each of four smaller barrels will have of his 42 gallons nearly 2 gallons untaxed, and may thus save at least $1.75, which his competitor must pay. This evil increases, too, the cost and expense of collecting the revenue, because the inducement to use smaller packages increases their number and adds to the labor and expense of gauging and inspecting.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] asks us to believe it unjust to tax parts of gallons because, he tells us, they do not go into use; that the manufacturer does not get the benefit of them. The bill we are considering provides that when these high wines or spirits are taken from the distillery warehouse and pass from the control of the Government, when they go to the owner and to his own use, ownership, and control, he pays taxes on the aggregate number of gallons, of both whole gallons and fractional parts. He has the ownership and use of the fractional parts of a gallon to the same extent as any other product of his distillery. We have been told in this debate that other makers had an advantage over the makers of high wines or distilled spirits of the particular quality made by some distillers in Illinois and in Cincinnati—maybe elsewhere.

It is true there is provision made for losses by leakage, but it applies to makers all alike. Whoever leaves distilled spirits in the distillery warehouses such length of time as to incur loss from evaporation or any of the processes by which nature lessens the quantity of distillery products, has or may have an allowance for such loss. The owner who withdraws his product before there is a loss of course has no allowance, nor should he have any. The manufacturers for whom the gentleman from Ohio speaks have just the same advantages and privileges as all others; they should have no more. If they take out or withdraw their high wines immediately they have no loss and get no allowance.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but I desire to make a suggestion, if he will allow me.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Does not the gentleman from Illinois know that the high-wines distillers get no advantage at all by keeping them; and if they do so they have loss in soakage, just as the Bourbon distillers; but the Bourbon distillers have to keep their spirits for age? We—I mean the men for whom I am speaking—gain nothing by holding on to them. Others do. Our loss is immediate, and we want to provide for it in this way.

Mr. MORRISON. If you gain nothing by holding on, you lose nothing by letting go.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Does not my friend know that the testimony of every distiller in the country is, that when they draw off the goods from the cistern, in the first instance, taking them into the warehouses, every barrel will entail a dead loss of half a gallon?

Mr. MORRISON. In justice you ought not to put it on the other half-gallon, should you?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Not at all. My friend knows every distiller can so gauge his package that he will be simply allowed that half-gallon, and that half-gallon is exempt from taxation only because it does not exist; it is a loss to the distiller, to the Government, to the commercial world absolutely. That is the reason.

Mr. MORRISON. There is not so much lost by what I believe the gentleman called soakage—there is not so much lost in soakage as in suckage. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think the suckage is nearly always lost. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman criticised the action of the Ways and Means Committee in reporting this bill, and referred to the fact that the makers in Illinois put their distilled spirits in great big honest barrels that contain 42 or 40 gallons, on all of which he admits, I believe, the taxes are paid, and then proposes to prevent our respective friends and constituents from cheating the Government, or cheating each other, by making them put their goods, their distilled spirits, in a larger cask or a larger barrel. The Ways and Means Committee wanted to accommodate the trade and allow those engaged in it to choose for themselves the size of the cask or other vessel in which they shall put their wares or goods; but whatever they do put them in we want them to pay taxes on all of them.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SOWDEN. Is not the alleged gain on the spirits lost made up on the extra cost of the keg?

Mr. MORRISON. No. Putting the spirits into smaller casks may make an increased cost equal to the tax on the half-gallon, or probably more; but you put the spirits in the smaller cask for your own convenience; and if you do that for your own convenience and your own profit, you ought not to take the cost of doing it out of the public Treasury. All we want and require by the bill is that those who make this product, upon which the Government has fixed a tax, shall pay it, and pay it as the law provides, when the whiskies are removed or taken away from the distillery warehouse.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Suppose that, owing to some law which no human contrivance could control, there was a loss of a gallon every time a barrel was drawn off, would you hold it right to tax the distiller for that gallon of spirits which he could not get or use?

Mr. MORRISON. I hold it right to treat all distillers alike. I want them all to pay their tax alike, the tax which the law provides they shall pay; and if these gentlemen who draw the distilled spirits off from the distillery into the warehouse and take it directly there—though in fact I think it very often takes another course, and never goes by the warehouse at all——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH (interposing). Oh, that is a fraud, which of course ought to be guarded against; but I want to ask my friend——

Mr. MORRISON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I say that if it in any way occurs that these manufacturers lose in drawing off these spirits the loss ought not to be taxed and the law ought to provide for that, but we ought to have a law applying to all alike, and not compel the honest men to pay and let the crafty escape.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, there is no purpose of that kind. Now I will ask my friend to give me a categorical answer to my question. Suppose that in drawing off a barrel of spirits there should be a conceded loss of half a gallon, will my friend hold that the Government ought to collect a tax upon that half-gallon?

Mr. MORRISON. If such a state of facts exists, bring in your bill, send it to the committee from which this bill comes, go there and convince these gentlemen [indicating Mr. KELLEY, Mr. HEWITT, and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas] that such loss does occur, and they will undoubtedly report a bill providing that in such cases the distiller shall be allowed a half-gallon for waste.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But my friend knows that we have not been heard in this matter. If he will consent to recommit this bill and give us a hearing, and we do not satisfy the committee that we are right, I will withdraw all opposition.

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, no. This bill only provides that all shall pay tax under the law as it is. Those who complain of its proposed modification are those who have availed themselves of all the advantages it affords. All do not avail themselves of this advantage, and it is hardly just to let some escape this tax because they are less scrupulous than others.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But suppose it is true that in taking these spirits from the cisterns to the warehouses there is an actual loss which can be ascertained?

Mr. MORRISON. That may be true.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, if it is so, you would not want this bill to pass if you could provide for correcting existing evil and at the same time save that to the distillers, would you?

Mr. MORRISON. I want this bill to pass because it proposes to treat all alike and that all shall be treated alike. As to this loss of which you speak, if you want to provide for that, I have already indicated it may be taken up and considered separately.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But you do not want to do the wrong that this bill would do if you can avoid it?

Mr. MORRISON. This bill is just right. It is the wrong we are trying to correct. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT. It is not this bill which produces the loss of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] speaks. That loss occurs without reference to this bill.

Mr. MORRISON. I wish the Clerk to read to the House what the Commissioner of Internal Revenue says upon this subject for a reply to the gentleman's criticism of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

TAXATION OF FRACTIONAL PARTS OF A GALLON OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

I desire to invite your special attention to what appears to be a pressing need for legislation taxing all fractions of a gallon of distilled spirits.

Under the present law any fractional part of a gallon amounting to one half-gallon or over, in a cask or package, is taxed as a gallon, but any fractional part of a gallon less than one half-gallon in any cask or package is exempt from tax. This provision was undoubtedly made upon the assumption that in filling large numbers of packages the fractional parts of a gallon would be indifferently above or below a half-gallon, as might happen, and that the fractions taxed as full gallons would balance the fractions exempt from tax.

But in practice this assumption has not proved to be correct.

It is quite practicable for the distiller so to fill his packages as to have a large fraction less than one half-gallon in nearly every instance.

The tax-payer does not omit to avail himself of this opportunity, and consequently taxable fractions, equal to or exceeding a half-gallon, occur in packages when filled at the distillery cisterns, only infrequently and by accident, while the untaxed fraction is of constant occurrence.

When spirits remain in the distillery warehouse for a considerable time the natural changes in their volume and proof will render the size of the fraction, upon regauge at the time of withdrawal, a matter of chance entirely, as assumed by the statute.

But much the larger portion of the spirits manufactured remains in warehouse for a brief period only, and very large quantities are, immediately after entry, removed to rectifying-houses, where the untaxed fractions are made fully available by the distiller or owner.

It is probable that at least five hundred thousand packages contained a large, untaxed fraction upon removal from warehouse, during the last fiscal year, over and above the packages whose fractions, taxed and untaxed, fairly offset each other.

The direct result of this practice, as it has prevailed in former years, is the loss of a very appreciable amount of revenue. But during the last year a disposition has been manifested to profit by this method of avoiding taxation to a greatly increased extent.

The plan has been adopted at several large distilleries of substituting packages of 10 gallons capacity and upward in place of the spirit barrel of ordinary size, for the sole purpose, apparently, of obtaining the benefit of the untaxed fraction as frequently as possible.

This threatens to be a matter of very serious consequence, as the profit derivable from the fractions, especially if trebled or quadrupled, is sufficient to induce or to compel competitors to resort to the same device, and a large part of the distillers of finished spirits and of high wines already declare that they shall be forced to adopt it.

The tax lost thereby is but one of the evils resulting from this practice. The multiplication of packages increases the labor and expense of gauging and inspection and of the reports and accounts of the packages and their contents. But the evil most to be deprecated is an unwholesome rivalry of this sort, which is found to stimulate invention and to lead continually to efforts to obtain other advantages, and those of a less legitimate character, in advance of competitors in business, or in place of the benefits from fractions in cases where the latter are not available.

I am of the opinion that the practice should be checked without delay, and that the best remedy will be found in taxing all fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits; and for this purpose I respectfully recommend that legislation be had which, in lieu of the present method of taxing and exempting fractions, shall authorize the assessment and collection monthly, in like manner as other taxes are assessed and collected, of the tax upon the whole number of proof gallons, or of wine gallons when below proof, which the fractions of gallons removed from each distillery warehouse may aggregate.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, there are two objects to be attained by the passage of this bill. One is to secure to the Government the tax upon all spirits distilled, instead of upon a part only. The other is to shape the law so that it shall not benefit one class of distillers to the injury of others. The average price on the market of high wines is about $1.08 a gallon. The tax is 90 cents a gallon. The Government takes, then, as tax, five-sixths of the gross receipts for a gallon of high wines when a distiller sells it. This being so, every member of the House can see at a glance that any clause or operation of the law which releases some distillers from paying tax upon a part of the spirits they manufacture while collecting from other distillers the full tax upon all that they manufacture is a most unfair, unequal, and unjust exercise of the power of taxation.

The Government has no right to use its power for collecting revenue to build up one branch of an industry and to destroy another. This injustice does exist under the present law, and will exist under any amendment or substitute that may be offered to the present bill that will so change it as to exempt a part of the products of distillation from taxation. There is but one fair, equal way of doing, and that is to tax all fractions of a gallon as well as the whole gallon, excepting no part, but making the entire quantity distilled subject to assessment and taxation.

This is the object of the present bill. As the law now stands, if the fraction of a gallon in a keg or barrel or package is less than one-half, it pays no tax at all. If it is over one-half, it pays for a full gallon. There is no doubt that in framing this law the presumption was that there would be, in the ordinary course of business, about as many fractional gallons over one-half as under one-half, so that on an average the Government would neither make nor lose revenue, and would avoid the complications of fractional stamps. But this presumption has proved to be untrue. Distillers, while acting under the strict letter of the law, have evaded the payment of the tax on nearly one-half a gallon in each package. Their packages have been constructed so as to make the fraction always a little under one-half.

All gentlemen are not familiar with the details of the manufacture of spirits, or with the different kinds of spirits manufactured. If they were, they would understand why these distillers who have rectifying establishments connected with their business are anxious to keep the law as it is; and would also see the advantage that the law as it now is gives to this class of distillers over others in the business. The distiller who both distils and rectifies practically gets the advantage of the untaxed half-gallon, while the manufacturer of alcohol or cologne spirits, who sees his products in this shape, gets very little, if any, advantage. Neither does the manufacturer of that class of goods which are aged before being sold get any advantage.

I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment while I explain these different modes of manufacture and the manner of business of the trade, so that members may see and understand why the great rectifying districts that turn corn into dead-center, instantaneous, forty-rod, chain-lightning, cheap whisky that is put on the market as soon as made get the lion's share of the advantage of the untaxed half-gallon, and why other distillers can not get it; and also that they may understand how much revenue the Government loses by this half-gallon law. When the distiller makes his product, it is in the first place drawn into a receiving tank or cistern.

From this it is drawn into barrels or packages, and these are gauged by the Government gaugers to ascertain the amount of tax to be paid. The distiller can now pay the tax at once and put his goods on the market. Or he can put them into the distillery bonded warehouse until the first day of the ensuing month. If he has not paid the tax by this time he can bond his spirits for three years and pay the tax at any time within the three years. My friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] talks of the loss by soakage into the barrel, &c., and insists that the distiller ought to have the advantage of an untaxed half-gallon to offset this loss. Why, sir, he comes from a distilling district, and he knows as well as I do that the inside of every package is sized, or glued, to prevent absorption, and that practically there is no loss by it. Now let us see if there is any loss for which the Government has not already made a liberal allowance.

If the distiller sells his wines as soon as produced the gauge made when they are drawn from the cistern gives the correct quantity, and it is upon that gauge that he pays the tax. But suppose he does not put them on the market at once, but puts them in the bonded warehouse? As I said before, they may lay there in bond for three years. There would naturally then be some loss by evaporation, leakage, &c. But my friend from Ohio was mistaken on one point right here, although he did not, I am sure, intend to deceive the House. When the spirits are taken out of the warehouse the tax is not paid upon the original gauge, as I understood him to say. They are, upon application of the distiller, regauged, and the tax is charged upon the regauge, and not upon the original gauge. So that the distiller does not have to pay tax upon what has leaked out, or been absorbed or evaporated.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Do you say that is so as to high wines?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I will read from the law. I refer to the act of May 28, 1880:

SEC. 17. Whenever the owner of any distilled spirits shall desire to withdraw the same from the distillery warehouse or from a special bonded warehouse, he may file with the collector a notice giving a description of the packages to be withdrawn, and request that the distilled spirits be regauged; and thereupon the collector shall direct the gauger to regauge the same, and mark upon each package so regauged the number of gauge or wine gallons and proof gallons therein contained. If upon such regauging it shall appear that there has been a loss of distilled spirits from any cask or package, without the fault or negligence of the distiller or owner thereof, taxes shall be collected only on the quantity of distilled spirits contained in such cask or package at the time of the withdrawal thereof from the distillery warehouse or special bonded warehouse: Provided, however, That the allowance which shall be made for such loss of spirits as aforesaid shall not exceed 1 proof gallon for two months or part thereof, 1½ gallons for three and four months, 2 gallons for five and six months, 2½ gallons for seven and eight months, 3 gallons for nine and ten months, 3½ gallons for eleven and twelve months, 4 gallons for thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen months, 4½ gallons for sixteen, seventeen, and eighteen months, 5 gallons for nineteen, twenty, and twenty-one months, 5½ gallons for twenty-two, twenty-three, and twenty-four months, 6 gallons for twenty-five, twenty-six, and twenty-seven months, 6½ gallons for twenty-eight, twenty-nine, and thirty months, 7 gallons for thirty-one, thirty-two, and thirty-three months, and 7½ gallons for thirty-four, thirty-five, and thirty-six months.

Thus the allowance for outage runs on in proportion to the length of time the spirits are in bond, for three years, when it may amount to 7½ gallons, that being the maximum loss which is allowed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now, will my friend——

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I have so little time and so much to say that I must decline to be interrupted.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not want to be placed in a false light before the House.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The gentleman will have an opportunity to correct me if I am wrong. I said he had no intention of deceiving the House.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand that, and I did not deceive the House.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Now, I have cited the law to show that it is exceedingly liberal in its allowance as to losses by leakage, &c., on distilled spirits. I now wish to call attention to what the Commissioner of Internal Revenue says in his last report as to the tax that spirits, Bourbon whiskies, and others actually paid during the last fiscal year. It will be seen that instead of their paying 90 cents per gallon on the quantity that actually went into the warehouse, they have paid in many cases as low as 80, 81, or 82 cents a gallon. This was owing to the allowance for leakage, evaporation, &c., made under the law I have cited:

As the foregoing tables show not only the quantity of all kinds of spirits withdrawn for all purposes and the quantity allowed for leakage, evaporation, &c., but also the quantity of each kind so withdrawn and so allowed, they afford the means of determining the actual amount of tax paid on each gallon of each kind of spirits produced. Computations on this basis show that the tax paid on withdrawal of each gallon produced was as follows: Bourbon whisky, nearly 81 cents per taxable gallon; rye whisky, nearly 80 cents per gallon; alcohol, 89.99 cents per gallon; rum, 89.23 cents per gallon; gin, 89.74 cents per gallon; high wines, 89.61 cents per gallon; pure, neutral, or cologne spirits, 89.56 cents per gallon; miscellaneous, 88.34 cents per gallon.

In other words, the allowance for leakage, waste, evaporation, &c., from the time the spirits were first gauged and went into the warehouse until they were taken out, reduced the tax from 90 cents per gallon upon the whole amount to 80, 81, and 82 cents upon these finer grades of whisky. Certainly under this showing there is no foundation for the claim that another half-gallon ought to be allowed in every package to go untaxed to make up for some possible loss or waste.

But the gentleman from Ohio proposes to remedy the injustice of the present law by an amendment to this bill that will leave the half-gallon part of the law as it now is, but will make the smallest package into which spirits can be drawn and gauged 30 gallons, instead of 10, as now provided.

If gentlemen will recall what I have already said in describing how these goods are drawn from the cistern and gauged in packages they can see the abuse of the present law in the use of the 10-gallon package, the loss to the Government it causes, and the advantage it gives to every distiller who has a rectifying establishment connected with his distillery. The rectifying establishment must be 600 feet from the distillery. As the high wines are drawn off from the receiving cistern they are drawn not into ordinary barrels of 40 or 50 gallons, but are drawn exclusively into 10-gallon packages, because only 1 half-gallon can be gained to a package. Forty-two gallons drawn into four 10-gallon packages, I speak in round numbers, gives in each package 10½ gallons, and the distiller, on the 42 gallons, by saving the fraction on each package, pays tax on only 40 gallons. If he had put the whole 42 into one barrel he could only have saved paying tax on 1 half-gallon.

You see now how useful this little joker, in the shape of a 10-gallon keg, is to the distiller who rectifies as well as distils. These 10-gallon packages are not commercial packages. They are not used to ship spirits when put on the market, but are used solely as whisky ducts, to transfer the spirits from the distillery to the rectifying-house, and there dumping it are then taken back to the distillery and filled and carted over the 600 feet to the rectifying-house and dumped again, and so on indefinitely. Now how will the 30-gallon package, which the gentleman's amendment proposes, work? When he gave notice, in his remarks the other day, that he would offer an amendment, he stated that it would be to change the present law to what it used to be. That was 20 gallons instead of 10. In that way he would have reduced the evil just one-half. Under that amendment the distillers would use 20-gallon kegs to carry the spirits from the distillery to the rectifying-house instead of 10. I am glad to know that he has experienced a great change of heart since then. He now proposes to fix the limit at 30 gallons. That is, he now proposes to do away with two-thirds of the evil instead of one-half. Why not abolish it entirely, as this bill proposes, instead of tinkering with it?

I wish to say to you gentlemen who do not represent distilling districts that you have but little idea of the loss of revenue that the Government sustains by this half-gallon allowance. I have here a computation made by a distiller of my district, to which I desire to call the attention of the House. And I wish to say right here that all distillers are not in favor of this half-gallon arrangement. I represent the greatest distilling district in the United States or in the world. It is a distilling district which does not rectify much. During the year ending June 30, 1885, it manufactured 14,650,000 gallons of spirits. The first district of Ohio manufactured for the same time 13,000,000 gallons. But now look at the rectifying statistics. The Illinois district rectified in the same time 910,000 gallons. The Ohio district rectified 9,300,000, more than ten times as much. You can see where the little joker comes in. Let us follow this still further.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You want the little joker under your hat.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I was proceeding to call attention to the computation I referred to, and by it to show what a distiller who uses the 10-gallon package gains in not paying tax over one who uses the common package or barrel of 45 gallons. A house that mashes 2,000 bushels a day, 300 days in the year, allowing 4 gallons to the bushel, and uses a 45-gallon package, saving the fraction of untaxed spirit on each package, avoids the payment thereby in round numbers of $21,000 tax in a year. Another house using the minimum package, say 11 gallons, avoids the payment of $83,000 tax in a year. I submit the computation in detail herewith, to be published as a part of my remarks.

Distillery "A." which sells original packages, ordinary size, mashing daily 2,000 bushels, produces 4 gallons spirits per bushel; 2,000 × 4 = 8,000 gallons × 300 days = 2,400,000 gallons × 90 cents tax = $2,160,000; filled in 45-gallon barrels, at 101 per cent. proof, would fill 52,805 barrels of 45.45 gallons, fractions free = 2,376,225 taxable gallons = $2,138,602.50.

Distillery "B," which removes, dumps, and compounds liquors, mashing 2,000 bushels per day × 4 gallons to bushel = 8,000 gallons × 300 working days = 2,400,000 gallons × 90 cents tax, as above = $2,160,000; filled in kegs of 11 gallons, at 104 per cent. proof, for removal and dumping, would fill 209,781 kegs of 11.44 gallons, fractions free = 2,307,591 taxable gallons × 90 cents = $2,076,831.90.

RECAPITULATION.

"A" gains in fractions..... and the Government loses that amount.	$21,397 50
"B" gains in fractions..... and the Government loses that amount.	83,168 10
"B" is ahead more than "A".....	61,770 60

Gentlemen can now see the injustice of the operation of the present law. This computation is based on a 2,000-bushel house. We have distilleries that mash 5,000 bushels a day. It will be seen that in the case cited the 10-gallon-package distiller gains $60,000 a year over his competitor who uses a 45-gallon package. My friend from Ohio says "Oh, no; we will not pass the present bill, but in place of it we will prohibit the 10-gallon package and make 30 gallons the smallest size." Well, all that would amount to would be that the Government would not lose quite so much revenue as it does now, and the distiller using a 30-gallon package would not have quite so great an advantage over the one using a 45-gallon one. Instead of having $60,000 a year advantage, as in the case I have cited, he would only have one-third of that advantage, or $20,000 a year. As I said before, the gentleman from Ohio's plan would abolish two-thirds of the evil.

In reply to a remark of mine made to the gentleman when speaking on this subject the other day, he retorted by saying, "Your people in Peoria manufacture high wines and cologne spirits and put them in 40-gallon packages, double-proof spirits, so you get 80 gallons in a barrel in this way." Some who heard this statement may have concluded from it that by this arrangement the Peoria distiller only paid tax on 40 gallons, when the package really contained 80 proof gallons. I do not think he intended to leave that impression, because he knows as well as I do, and as well as every one in the House does who is at all familiar with the subject, that the tax is not paid on the wine gallon but upon the proof gallon. If, then, you put 40 wine gallons of double-proof spirits into a barrel you pay tax not on 40 but on 80 gallons.

But, Mr. Chairman, notice how ingeniously and successfully the 30-gallon arrangement of proof spirits suggested by my friend from the first Ohio district would work compared with a 40-gallon package of double proof. Every time a 30-gallon package of proof spirits was filled there would be poured in this extra half-gallon upon which no tax would be paid, while the man who filled the 40-gallon package of double-proof spirits could only save a half-gallon on every 80 gallons. The one would save it on every 30 gallons, the other on every 80 gallons. The gentleman was correct in stating that cologne or neutral spirits, alcohol, and high wines, when shipped, are generally made double proof. This is to save freight, but it saves no tax. And as a quart, wine measure, of double-proof spirits makes a half-gallon of proof or taxable spirits, the distiller who hopes to save an untaxed half-gallon of double-proof spirits must limit the fractional excess to a little less than a quart of the fluid; and it is difficult to get cooperage so exact as to enable him to take much practical advantage in a barrel, with the uncertainty of gauging, when he is compelled to figure down so closely as to keep within a quart measure.

It is easily seen, then, how great an advantage the distillers who make their high wines into whisky would have under my friend's plan when they use a 30-gallon package and save a half-gallon tax, which means exactly 45 cents, over the distillers who make alcohol, cologne spirits, or high wines, and ship them in double-proof packages, and who could not possibly save more than 45 cents on every 80 gallons.

Now, I do not care to consume much more time. I think I have made myself understood, but I want to say just one or two words more with reference to another phase of the matter.

Those who have examined this subject carefully tell us that the best estimate they can make of the proportion of spirits manufactured in this country and used for drinking purposes is from one-third to one-half of the total amount manufactured. It is a liberal estimate to assume, then, according to every statistician, that one-half of the product of the distilleries of the country is in use for purposes of beverage, while the remainder of it, according to the estimates, is used solely and purely for manufacturing purposes. Now, whatever may be the prejudices of gentlemen with reference to the production of spirits to be used for beverages, there can be no prejudice, I take it, against the legitimate manufacture of spirits to be used in chemistry, manufactures, and in the arts. But spirits distilled to be used for manufacturing purposes or in the arts and sciences are put up in double-proof, full-barrel packages. The benefits that accrue from the untaxed half-gallon accrue almost entirely to the class of spirits made for beverages, that is, the spirits that are distilled and taken to the rectifying establishments connected with the distilleries and made into the cheaper kinds of whisky. Now, are you gentlemen in favor of any discrimination that shall be against the class of distilleries whose wares enter the market for manufacturing purposes and for the arts, and in favor of the class whose wares are used almost solely for beverages?

Another word. Those who manufacture the finer grades of whisky get but little advantage from this half-gallon system, and you can see in a moment why it is so The Bourbon whiskies are generally aged, and lay in bond for three years before being put on the market. They gain value, as my friend from Ohio puts it, by becoming "mellow" from age. No distiller in the world can make a package, fill it with spirits and set it away, and let it gain this advantage of age by remaining in store from one to three years, and tell when he takes it out whether it is to gain the half-gallon or lose it. His package is just as likely to have a fraction over a half-gallon, and be thereby taxed for a whole gallon, as to have a fraction under a half and escape taxation. The reason of this is that it is impossible to tell what the exact loss will be from leakage and evaporation after from six months to three years' storage.

For this reason this class of spirits is practically outside entirely of the benefit of this half-gallon law. So, as I said before, all the benefits that accrue to any class of distillers go almost alone to that class who distil and rectify, making an article that is placed on the market very shortly after its manufacture, while it operates very unjustly, no matter what size of package is used, against all other classes of distillers.

All we ask under the sun is that you make a law that will make every distiller pay tax for every gallon that he manufactures. We can not do anybody injustice by such a law, and that is simply what the bill under consideration proposes to do. You need not worry about the leakage or absorption in these barrels. The distillers will take care of that, and will ask you for relief quick enough if they need it. This kind of loss is reduced to such a minimum that it cuts no particular figure. And I say to you, gentlemen, in conclusion, that instead of the entire distilling interest being opposed to this bill, that it was introduced at the suggestion of that class of distillers who ask that all shall stand upon a common platform, that platform being the assessment and collection, impartially and universally, of all the tax upon all the spirits distilled, no matter when made or for what purpose.

With an annual pension-roll of $75,000,000, and an outstanding national debt of hundreds of millions, it will be many years, if ever, before the tax on distilled liquors will be abolished. It pours into the Treasury about $70,000,000 a year, and is a tax that is more lightly felt than any other that can be levied. For these reasons the law should be amended in every particular that is necessary to a thorough, exact, and equitable collection of this tax.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY].

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes allotted to me I have not time to go into the merits of the bill. But I will say this much asto it, after a practical experience of several years in the internal-revenue service, that I think the bill in two particulars will work hardship and injustice. If the Government intends to impose a tax upon the fractional part of a gallon—and I am willing to concede that the arguments offered by the chairman of the committee and the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. WORTHINGTON] show a disposition on the part of some of those large distillers engaged in the manufacture of distilled spirits to evade the law as to 10-gallon packages—I think that the Internal Revenue Office should provide a stamp, as can well be done, instead of the proposed assessment plan. Under the operation of the assessment system of the Internal Revenue Office great injustice and great injury has been done, especially to the small distillers.

But I do not propose now to discuss that branch of the subject. With regard to fruit distillers—and I speak especially with reference to the fruit-distilling interests in the State of Virginia, which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, and in North Carolina, Kentucky, and Georgia—under the operation of the proposed bill, should it pass Congress and become the law, the interests of the fruit distillers of the country will be most injuriously affected thereby.

On the 9th instant, when the bill was under consideration, I gave notice that I would propose to amend it as follows:

Add to section 1 the following proviso:
"Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to brandy and wine manufactured from fruit, nor shall any such tax upon the fractional part of a gallon be assessed against any distiller engaged in the manufacture of brandy and wine from fruit."

Let us see about the operations of the present internal-revenue laws concerning fruit distillers.

From the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the year ending June 30, 1885, it will be seen that the total receipts for that year from spirits distilled from apples, grapes, or peaches was $1,321,897.58. The total number of fruit distilleries in operation during said year was 4,245, and the tax collected from them would average $311+ each. The four States operating the greatest number of fruit distilleries were Georgia, Kentucky, North Carolina, and Virginia; and upon this point I invite attention to the following statement from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue:

The following statement shows the number of fruit distilleries operated, the quantities of fruit brandy produced, and the amount of revenue derived therefrom during the last fiscal year in Georgia, Kentucky, North Carolina, and Virginia:

States.	Distilleries.	Production.	Tax collected.
	Number.	Gallons.	Dollars.
Georgia	291	43,894	39,504 64
Kentucky	360	142,533	128,279 84
North Carolina	1,214	85,062	76,555 38
Virginia	1,071	138,103	124,292 92
Total	2,936	409,592	368,632 78

Respectfully,

JOS. S. MILLER,
Commissioner.

In these four States 2,936 fruit distilleries were operated, and the average tax collected from them during the last fiscal year was $125+. Only 1,309 fruit distilleries were operated in all other States.

Mr. Chairman, the cost of collecting this tax during the last fiscal year in the said four States is shown from the following information kindly furnished me by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue:

In Georgia ten gaugers were on this duty at an expense of	$2,368
In Kentucky nineteen gaugers and six special deputies were employed; cost	8,929
In North Carolina fifty-eight gaugers and ten special deputies, expending	26,990
In Virginia forty-five gaugers and twelve special deputies, costing	23,134
	61,421
The total number of regular internal-revenue deputies and clerks on duty in said States was two hundred and sixty, and allowances for their pay and expenses $330,556. I am sure that 3 per cent. of this expenditure is a low estimate of the amount thereof properly chargeable to the operations of fruit distillers	9,916
The total amount expended for discovery and punishment of violations of internal-revenue laws during said year was $34,387.29, and I am certain that it is a low estimate to charge said four States under this account	3,000
For court expenses, arrest, trial, examination of witnesses, fees, &c., for these violations of law, in the four States, I estimate the small amount of	5,000
Thus the total expenses to the Government connected with the collection of said tax and enforcement of the law in said four States as to fruit distillers amounts to	79,337

The average tax paid by said 2,936 fruit distillers in the four States named was $125+, and it cost the Government an average of $27+ each to collect it.

Mr. Chairman, the total collections from all sources in the United States from internal revenue during the last fiscal year were $112,421,000, and the total cost of collecting the same was $4,455,430.27, or 3.9 per cent.

The total receipts from fruit distillers in the States of Georgia, Kentucky, North Carolina, and Virginia, as shown by the tabular statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, was $368,632.78, and the cost of collecting this tax, according to the figures herein given, was $79,337, or 21.5 per cent.

These figures from official records and estimates far below the actual expenditures for the purposes named speak for themselves, and clearly demonstrate the great injustice of the tax. It is a heavy burden upon the poor farmers engaged in making a barrel or two of brandy from the fruit, and as a matter of economy the Government should abolish the tax altogether. To impose the additional burden upon the hard-working tillers of the soil, as will be done under the present bill, is indeed a great wrong. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue does not contemplate, as I understand his report of this year, that the proposed tax on fractional parts of a gallon shall apply to fruit distillers.

Let us examine the effect of the enforcement of the law as the present bill proposes; and in order to do this I will endeavor to illustrate the practical operations of assessments against fruit distillers. The distiller registers his still for use; it has a producing capacity under the survey of 96 gallons per day, or 4 gallons per hour. July 1 he operates the same 13 hours, producing 52 gallons. He is for this 13 hours charged 24 hours and for 96 gallons of spirits. July 15 and 16 he again operates his still and for 25 hours, really producing 100 gallons of spirits; he is again charged for two whole days, 48 hours, and taxed with 192 gallons of brandy or spirits. July 30 he again operates his still and for only 10 hours, producing only 40 gallons of spirits, yet he is charged for 24 hours' operation, or 96 gallons of spirits. Thus he has operated his still 48 hours, producing actually 192 gallons, the tax on which would be $162.80; yet he will be charged with 96 hours, or 384 gallons, the tax on which is $325.60, just a difference of $162.80, which latter amount is assessed against him and he has to pay.

Now, as to the operation of the assessment feature under the proposed bill

The production of fruit brandy by the distilleries last fiscal year in the four States named was 409,592 gallons, or an average of 139 gallons—say four packages (the usual size) each.

If one thousand of these small distillers on each package of brandy produced by them have an excess of one half-gallon, we will have one thousand assessments against them of two gallons each, or $1.80 tax each; and I undertake to say that it will cost the Government in many cases twenty times the amount of the assessment to collect it, not to mention the vexation and injustice frequently done the fruit distillers.

In many instances, as I know from my own personal experience, the assessments made have been wrong, yet it has been with great difficulty, and very seldom, that the distillers have succeeded in getting relief from the Internal-Revenue Department; in fact, under the law and the decisions there is nothing else for the court to do but to insist upon the payment of the assessments as made by the Internal-Revenue Office. I know of many cases where poor fruit distillers have had assessments against them of about $8 or $10 deficiency, where judgment has been obtained and where it has sometimes cost the Government over $150 to collect the small judgment upon these assessments. I wish to say to the committee in conclusion, that this bill, unless it is amended, will work great injury and great wrong to the fruit-distilling interests, not only in the States that I have named, but in every part of the country where fruit distilleries are in operation.

Mr. MORRISON resumed the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has six minutes left.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to my colleague [Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois].

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there can be any question that the United States ought carefully to avoid making a discrimination between different classes of manufacturers of whisky, and if the existing law, or any proposed modification of the law, tends to benefit those manufacturers who use large packages as against those who use small, that discrimination should be avoided. Now, there is one loss about which I suppose there can be no possible mistake.

Whatever my colleague from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON] may have said, the loss by absorption into the fibers of the wood constituting the package is a real loss, which is capable of exact calculation. I am informed and believe that that loss amounts to about half a gallon in a 44-gallon barrel, and I suspect that that was the reason for the original law rather than the convenience or inconvenience of making stamps of particular denominations; for, if the 44-gallon barrel was the usual package when the law was made, and if that proportion of loss was the usual loss, then such a provision as we find in the existing law would be a reasonable and an accountable thing. What should be done is to provide that the exemption should be in proportion to the loss. Now the loss is in proportion to the superficial surface of the package in which the whisky is contained. The loss is greater in a 44-gallon barrel than in a 10-gallon package, but it is not greater in proportion; and the true form of this amendment would be to allow a certain exemption on account of that loss, but have it in proportion to the size of the package. I understand that even if whisky is removed within forty-eight hours there is this loss, that half a gallon in 44 gallons disappears and the distillers can not have any benefit from it. Clearly, on that half-gallon he should pay no tax. The form of the law should not be such as to drive distillers to use large packages rather than small packages, or small packages rather than large. That is a question outside of the sphere of Government. The private individual should be allowed to settle that question for himself according to the demands of trade. The Government should simply see that the whisky producer pays the tax on every gallon and every fractional gallon which he can put into the market, not which he can manufacture, provided some of that which he manufactures immediately disappears by absorption. What the Government should demand is, that if there is such a loss the distiller should be exempt to the amount of that loss, and that, in stating that exemption, there should be no discrimination between one class of distillers and any other class.

In order to secure such a law I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment of my friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], which I understand is now pending, and I will ask to have it read to illustrate the meaning of my remarks. It is intended as an amendment of the original bill, as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH]. Its effect is that, there being a loss of about 1 per cent. on every package, that shall be the amount which shall be exempt from tax, because it is utterly lost to the producer as well as to the consumer.

I ask now that this proposed amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in lieu of the existing law taxing certain fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits and exempting from taxation certain other parts of a gallon, all fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits in excess of 1 per cent. of the wine-gallon contents of the cask or package into which such distilled spirits may be drawn, produced on or after the 1st day of May, 1886, shall be taxed; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall thereafter assess, monthly, against each distiller, owner, or person having them in possession, a tax of 90 cents upon each proof gallon, or wine-gallon when below proof, which the fractional parts of a gallon in excess of 1 per cent. of the wine-gallon contents contained in casks or packages of distilled spirits produced by such distiller on or after said 1st day of May, 1886, and withdrawn from distillery warehouse or from special bonded warehouse upon payment of tax, or upon which the tax has otherwise become payable, during the preceding month, may aggregate, together with the proportionate tax upon any final fraction of a gallon beyond the number of full gallons aggregated; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make such regulations and prescribe such warehousing bonds as are needful to carry this law into effect. All assessments made under this act shall be a lien on all distilled spirits, on the distillery premises, the distillery used for distilling the same, the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, the tract of land whereon the said distillery is located, and any building thereon, from the time such assessment is made until the same shall have been paid.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, one view of this question which controls me has not been fully stated, though it has been alluded to in the progress of this discussion.

I represent a district that is largely interested in the production of Bourbon whisky and in legislation concerning whisky. My view is that a system which taxes a product some 300 or 400 per cent. on its prime cost is a system that constantly tempts to fraud—constantly offers temptation to men engaged in this business to take advantage of every possible method to escape taxation, or to use it for their benefit adversely to their competitors.

Besides, we can not shut our eyes to the fact that there is a widespread and growing sensitiveness in the country about all matters connected with the manufacture and sale of ardent spirits. It has seemed to me, therefore, that on every ground the wise policy for the distilling interest is to deal with absolute fairness in reference to the law and the law-making power, so that all that this interest is entitled to should be frankly asked for, and that no evasion, under whatever pretense or however plausibly defended, should be resorted to.

The statute to which this bill has reference was a statute for convenience. Upon the doctrine of probabilities, the fraction of a gallon in a package of spirits would exceed or fall below a half-gallon an equal number of times. It was therefore just for the Government to tax all fractions exceeding a half-gallon as if they were full gallons, and to exempt from tax all fractions less than a half-gallon. Thereby all whisky subject to tax would in the end be taxed by a process taxing certain fractions for more than their actual quantity, while relieving altogether from tax certain other fractions.

Mr. Chairman, it has not seemed to me the interest of the distillers of the country to be guilty of what (saying it with respect to everybody) would seem to me a miserable keeping within the letter of the statute. I have thought it better to shut that door—to subject honestly to taxation all the whisky that by law was meant to be taxed; and then, if the interests of this great revenue-producing industry require it, it should frankly say to the law-making power, "You tax that which we do not produce, and we ask a proper allowance under the law so that we may escape this injustice."

Without going into a consideration of the rival interests of the manufacturers of Peoria or Cincinnati—without making a calculation whether the discrimination was in favor of this or that particular form of this industry, but upon the broader and higher view that there is a statute which has been evaded—I have thought it wise to shut the door to the evasion. Furthermore, I have wished, as a representative of a part of that great interest, to show that it desires to deal with Congress upon an absolutely frank, open, and candid meeting of minds—a fair discussion of what may be the best interest of that branch of production. Therefore, I did not make the calculation that as 9,000,000 gallons of whisky are made and rectified in the district of the gentleman from Cincinnati, a tax upon a half-gallon in every 10 gallons would amount to $405,000, and there would thus be a saving to that extent; for whether any be saved or any be lost, it has appeared to me the proper thing to pass a statute taxing the whisky according to the spirit of the existing law; and then if any different allowance not given by the statute ought to be given, we can consider the question in that form.

Mr. Chairman, I desire now to yield to the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] so much of my time as he may want, reserving what he does not use.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, on the 16th instant—yesterday one week ago—it was ordered by the House of Representatives that a night session should be held in order to give gentlemen an opportunity to make speeches in reference to the bill then pending for the relief of Fitz-John Porter. In violation of an implied, if not an express, understanding, a member——

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the gentleman in making that statement states that which is not true, because I had a distinct understanding—— [Cries of "Order."] I will not be traduced on this floor. I claim my right and privilege as a member. I had a distinct understanding, not only with the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER, but with others, about that matter.

Mr. MORRISON. There has been quite enough of irrelevant matter introduced in the debate on this bill, and I protest against it. There shall be no more of it if I can prevent it.

Mr. WISE. What I wanted to say——

Mr. MORRISON. I make a point of order.

Mr. WISE. Allow me to finish my phrase.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] makes a point of order.

Mr. BRADY. I will not be misrepresented.

Mr. WISE. I have not yet declared how I intend to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois raises a point of order.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman from Illinois can not raise such a question until I have reached a point where I am out of order.

Mr. MORRISON. I think both gentlemen had got quite that far.

Mr. WISE. I want to make a statement. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, that a speech in reply to myself was made on that occasion, and I desired to ask the honorable gentleman from Illinois to permit me to say—because I want to be frank; I do not mean to imitate or to follow the bad example of those who have gone before me—I meant to declare that my purpose on this occasion in occupying the floor, if I am permitted to do so without objection, is to reply to that speech. I have no purpose—and I declare it in advance—to speak upon this whisky question.

Mr. BRADY. I made the same statement with respect to the Fitz-John Porter question before I made my speech.

Mr. MORRISON. Now, I insist——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule.

Mr. WISE. I know what the rule is; and if the gentleman from Illinois makes the point——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend a moment.

Mr. WISE. I know the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read clause 1 of Rule XIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

When any member desires to speak or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise and respectfully address himself to "Mr. Speaker," and, on being recognized, may address the House from any place on the floor or from the Clerk's desk, and shall confine himself to the question under debate, avoiding personality.

Mr. WISE. I wish to make an inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is made against the gentleman from Virginia proceeding in the line of remark which he has indicated, the Chair will be compelled to sustain it.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman himself frankly states that he does not wish to speak to the pending bill.

Mr. WISE. I rise now to claim my right to speak to a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. That is out of order in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WISE. But I understand that we are now in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WISE. I rise, then, to make a parliamentary inquiry to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois. On his motion the other day Saturday was set set apart for a debate. Now, is it permissible under that order of the House made yesterday on motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] for me to take the floor and submit remarks in answer to those which have been made by my colleague?

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair can only decide questions as they arise.

Mr. MORRISON. I understand there is the largest liberty of debate on Saturday under the order of the House adopted yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The order of the House yesterday provided that the session of Saturday of each week shall be devoted to debate only; no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. WISE. Very well, then; I will take my opportunity on Saturday next. [Applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. "On with the dance." [Laughter.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I now yield the floor, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. MORRISON. I trust now we will be allowed to pass the bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish for a few minutes to reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON]. It is only fair I should be allowed that opportunity.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman has been talking for an hour, and has had as much time on the pending proposition as anybody else.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. This bill came from the Committee on Ways and Means with a unanimous report in favor of its passage. It was therefore unnecessary to say anything on that side. We had on this side to attack the wisdom of its provisions and advocate necessary amendments. It is only fair I should have fifteen minutes.

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, no!

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then I will not take so much time.

Mr. MORRISON. I will give you ten minutes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Very well; then I will take ten minutes with a fraction. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Take it with a sliding scale.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly; with a sliding scale, if necessary, up to fifteen minutes.

Mr. MORRISON. No, we can not allow that.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to my honored friend from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON], who comes, he says, representing the distillers of his section, who are anxious to put more money into the national Treasury, that it is the first time in the history of this country that this or any other class of men ever came voluntarily and knocked at the door of the Treasury for permission to increase the sum they were paying as a revenue tax. "Beware of the Greeks bearing gifts." The fact of the business is, it is not a solicitude on their part to pay more money into the Treasury, but to get an advantage, and that advantage I pointed out the other day.

My friend has stated to this House that our people, the high-wine distillers of this country, can avail themselves of the law which provides for loss by evaporation, &c. They can not find any protection whatever under the operation of the Carlisle law. It affords the high-wine distiller no relief against loss. True, they can leave their goods in the warehouse if they will, but their goods are of a character which do not improve if left in from year to year. Hence they must put them upon the market at once, since keeping them in warehouse adds nothing to their quality as it does to Bourbon whiskies. Yet this House would be made to believe they could by storing, as the distillers of Bourbon whisky do, protect themselves against loss.

This House can not fail to note that the high-wine distiller, by leaving his goods in the warehouse, as the distiller of Bourbon does, the former would lose more in interest on his money than he would save if he got an allowance of a half-gallon by the delay in putting his goods on the market.

He would, as you must see, lose in interest the value of a half-gallon if he allowed his goods to remain in the warehouse sixty days.

One thing the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON] does not deny, that every distiller in this country loses a half-gallon in drawing off and removal of his spirits to the bonded warehouse. But he says if you allow Cincinnati distillers and the other producers of high wines in this country half a gallon they will get an advantage over us. Will the gentleman answer this question: If it is true that my constituents lose half a gallon on each barrel, is it their fault because in the gentleman's district they put two barrels in one, and therefore can not get the exact allowance they would if put into two packages? They save more in cooperage by putting two barrels into one than they lose in the fraction of a gallon.

You ask why we do not do the same. My answer is because we manufacture a different kind of goods, and they are used in compounding, &c., in our own city, and there put upon the market.

The gentleman from Kentucky says that this bill proposes to tax all who are engaged in the manufacture of whisky alike. That is precisely what we are willing to do. We do not ask anything else. I only protest that you shall not tax the half-gallon that we do not get. My friend from Illinois says that the General Government lost $200,000 by not taking an account of the fractions.

I ask why should they take an account of them if the distillers do not get them?

My friend [Mr. WORTHINGTON] appeals to the temperance element in this House, which is very large, and says his people manufacture spirits for the arts and the sciences, while the constituents of "his friend" from Cincinnati manufacture spirits for drinking purposes.

Mr. Chairman, we manufacture spirits for all uses to which they are applicable; but for whatever purpose manufactured, I claim, and it is all I ask, the right to be fairly protected.

Now a word as to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS]. What is it? The loss to every distiller is at least 1 per cent. It is a loss which is inseparable from the business, in soakage and in changing from the distillery to the warehouse.

I am satisfied with his amendment, and I am of opinion that it will be generally satisfactory to the distillers of the country. In point of fact this loss is more than 1 per cent.—I mean the half-gallon which is now by law allowed is more than 1 per cent.; but I am content with the amendment, and will vote for it—that is, that you shall tax the fractional gallons in excess of 1 per cent. It is a fair, honest amendment, and it certainly can not be objectionable to anybody.

But what does this bill propose? It proposes to tax every fraction less than a half-gallon, even though it is lost. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] taxes all of the fractions in excess of 1 per cent., the 1 per cent. being allowed to cover loss sustained.

But, Mr. Chairman, when you find distillers coming here and saying "We want to put more money into the Treasury," you can feel well assured that they are prompted by that spirit which with one hand puts a penny into the urn of poverty while with the other it takes the shilling out.

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] may well be satisfied. We protected the Bourbon distillers of his State against loss, and now we ask that you protect us in Indiana and Ohio. I am always ready to stand up in defense of every industry in this country. Why, even the threads on the bobbins up in New England are numbered, and the output of your iron furnaces and factories in Pennsylvania and everywhere else are carefully noted and protected. I ask not to escape taxation on one poor scruple of spirits, but I do ask that you do not tax that which our people do not get. Let us deal with Peoria, Pekin, Des Moines, Cincinnati, Chicago, and all places alike. This amendment does that. I have to meet a distiller, a dealer, or any one else who admits that the loss is not greater than is here provided for, and the statement, I submit, that this bill proposes simply to tax spirits is begging the question.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON] intimated that I tried to mislead the House in saying that we could not avail ourselves of the right that the Bourbon whisky dealers or manufacturers availed themselves of—that is, to have the spirits regauged. I have told you why. It is because it does no good to leave our goods in bond; they do not improve, and the interest on the money invested in the goods left in bond would be more than the value of the half-gallon saved as exempt from tax. This amendment simply provides that they shall tax all in excess of 1 per cent., and, as I have said, the internal-revenue department has recognized this as just and fair.

You have allowed this half-gallon for no other reason on earth than that it was just, and the only reason that this bill was suggested was to correct an abuse, an abuse the existence of which I admit and which, as my brother from Peoria suggested, enabled men to use a 10-gallon package, and thereby, while conforming to the letter of the law, violate its spirit. It is one of the cases of paying tithes of mint, anise, and cummin, but neglecting the weightier matters of the law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRISON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. In regard to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS], I desire to say if there is any part lost by absorption in the cask it is very small, and certainly it is about evenly distributed among the dealers. That question is one which would call for very nice calculation. If there is inequality in it, it would probably be in favor of those who use large casks, as I believe you will find that the wood exposed to 40 gallons of whisky inclosed in small packages has a far greater surface than where it is confined in a large package. But the remedy proposed would clearly work a greater inequality in the other direction. Consequently there will be inequality; but very small in both cases, and the one we have is the lesser. That subject would require, then, very careful calculation, such as can only be given in committee. If the gentleman will bring in a bill to remedy that minute point, I am sure it will get careful consideration from the committee.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue tells us this bill is necessary for an honest administration of the law and full collection of the tax as it stands. Nobody—as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] says—wants to pay more tax. The trouble is some people want to pay less tax. Honest men are at a disadvantage. We find, Mr. Chairman, that our present law has started a foot-race between evaporation and rascality, and in the contest rascality has come out victorious. I think the bill should be passed without any amendment or alteration at this time.

Mr. MORRISON. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has assured us that this bill is necessary to the honest collection of the revenue. The amendment of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] has to me a suspicious look about it, possibly because I do not understand it, and I will ask the committee to vote down these amendments and pass this bill. If the friends of these amendments have any equities, or those they represent have any distilled spirits that are being taxed that they do not use, I will be ready at any time to hear them and assist in bringing in a bill that will do them entire justice. We should now be allowed to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is next on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] in lieu of that proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

The amendment proposed by Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, was again read.

The question being taken, it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is next on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and as that has been voted down, I withdraw my own amendment.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4833) relating to taxes on fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits, had directed him to report it to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, and others called for a division.

The House divided; but before the affirmative vote was counted many members said, "Withdraw the call for further count."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is further count insisted upon?

Further count was not insisted on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Further count not being insisted on——

Mr. COWLES. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The "ayes" have it, and the bill is passed.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JAMES. I desire again to submit the resolution with reference to the debate on the coinage bill. The gentleman who last objected has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. HAMMOND. I insist on my motion.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 91, noes 42.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1577) to amend the third section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian reservations in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 55) to authorize the sale of timber on certain lands reserved for the use of the Menomonee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, to report it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The substance of the original bill is retained unchanged, but there are certain amendments which meet the ideas suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] in debate, and it has been found convenient to make the report of the bill with the amendments incorporated. I wish to have the substitute printed in a fashion which will show the proposed changes from the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose from my knowledge of the views of the Senate, from the debate which has taken place, that the bill will not give rise to much debate hereafter. Senators, I think, thoroughly understand it, and their views will be found to be pretty well fixed upon it. I shall give notice, therefore, that at a very early day I propose to call it up and have it disposed of, either by laying aside informally the then pending order or at some time when the Senate is not engaged on other business.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 121) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as a post-road, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committe, to whom was referred the bill (S. 63) to authorize the construction of a highway bridge across that part of the waters of Lake Champlain lying between the towns of North Hero and Alburg, in the State of Vermont, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 446) to amend section 4400 of the Revised Statutes so that vessels under 5 tons burden, and used for private purposes and not carrying passengers for hire, shall not be subject to license, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1403) to provide for an American register for the steamship Ozama, of New York city, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

ROBERT H. ANDERSON.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am authorized by the Committee on the Judiciary to report favorably the bill for the relief of Robert H. Anderson, of the State of Georgia, from his political disabilities. I ask for its present consideration, as I see my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is here.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 877) for the relief of Robert H. Anderson, of the State of Georgia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed (two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative).

BRIDGES OVER SAINT CROIX RIVER.

Mr. McMILLAN. From the Committee on Commerce I report favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 1476) to amend the act of Congress approved June 12, 1884, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin." I ask the Senate to consider the bill at this time.

The bill was read for information; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 10, after the word "Northern," to strike out the word "Railway" and insert "Railroad;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That an act of Congress approved June 12, 1884, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin," be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words "Winona, Alma and Northern Railway Company," wherever the same occur in the said law, and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "the Chicago, Burlington and Northern Railroad Company, its successors and assigns."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 1635) granting a pension to John Rasler; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committtee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1636) to reduce the rate of postage on seeds, scions, bulbs, and plants; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 1637) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Marine Service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1638) for the relief of Samuel W. Hamilton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EUSTIS introduced a bill (S. 1639) to make bills of lading conclusive in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1640) for the relief of Hugh O'Neil; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER introduced a bill (S. 1641) for the relief of Frederick Foote, of Fairfax County, Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1642) granting a pension to William F. Harmon; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1643) to grant a pension to John Waters; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS introduced a bill (S. 1644) providing for an inspection of meats for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This bill was reported last year from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and besides providing for the inspection of pork, &c., for exportation, it contained a section which gave the President of the United States authority, whenever he was convinced that unjust discriminations were made against American products desired to be imported into other countries, to suspend importations from those countries of such articles as he thought fit for the protection of the just interests of the United States. In view of what I see by the newspapers is going on in other countries touching American productions, on the theory that they are supposed to be diseased, when it is obvious as a matter of fact that it is merely a method of excluding American productions that the people want, I think it desirable that this subject should be again brought definitely to the attention of the committee and the Senate. I therefore introduce the bill and ask that it be referred to the same committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1645) to regulate commerce among the several States and to codify the law relating to bills of exchange and other commercial paper; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LOGAN. From the first part of the title it would seem that the bill should go the Committee on Commerce, but it proposes to regulate bills of exchange, commercial paper, and matters of that character, and therefore I ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I introduce the bill by request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. STANFORD. The bill (S. 1605) to establish a quarantine station at the port of San Francisco, introduced by me several days ago, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, when it should have been referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases. I ask that that change of reference be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The change of reference will be made as requested, there being no objection.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. SABIN. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Edway A. Grant, late postmaster at Fargo, Dak. (Senate bill No. 267), be taken from the files of the Senate for the purpose of being referred to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives, there being no adverse report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can not refer papers to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An order withdrawing the papers will answer the purpose.

Mr. SABIN. I asked that the papers might be referred to the Committee on Claims of the other House for the purpose of passing upon a bill which is now before that committee, a duplicate of the bill which was introduced in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The ordinary method in such cases where papers are wanted in the other House is for that House to ask this House to send the papers. I do not know, but without violating any propriety we might order that the papers be sent to the House of Representatives, but we could hardly send them to one of its committees, I suppose, as a reference.

Mr. HARRIS. Is this anything more than an order withdrawing papers under the rule? The Senator submitting the order simply assigns the reason why he wishes to withdraw the papers, but it seems to me it is simply an order to withdraw.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It can be modified so as to make it a simple withdrawal. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification can be made by striking out a clause in the latter part of the order.

Mr. SABIN. I ask to have the order amended so as simply to withdraw the papers.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the order be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read as proposed to be amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Edway A. Grant, late postmaster at Fargo, Dak. (Senate bill No. 267), be taken from the files of the Senate, there being no adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota proposes to strike out the clause "for the purpose of being referred to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives."

Mr. EDMUNDS. He has a right to modify it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be considered as modified, there being no objection.

On motion of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim relating to the equitable and legal rights of parties in possession of certain lands and improvements thereon in California be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of James Belger be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

GORDON'S LANDING BREAKWATER.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to report to the Senate any information in his possession concerning the utility of a breakwater at Gordon's Landing, on Lake Champlain, in Vermont, with an estimate of the cost of a suitable structure at that place.

GEORGETOWN AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to cause to be made a careful examination of the Aqueduct Bridge at Georgetown, and report its present condition, especially as to its safety for ordinary travel when the aqueduct is filled with water.

PLANTS AND SHRUBS FOR PENSION BUILDING.

Mr. BECK. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote whereby House joint resolution 71 was passed by the Senate yesterday, it being a joint resolution authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia, and directing him as well, "to supply, and to keep supplied, from the public greenhouses and nurseries, the vases around the interior court of the Pension building with plants and shrubs suitable thereto."

My object in asking for a reconsideration is to have an explanation from the Committee on the Library in regard to that resolution. I happened to meet the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds last night, and speaking about matters altogether disconnected with this measure, he said to me that we should have to make an appropriation of $1,600 more for him this year; that as soon as the joint resolution had passed the other House he had an examination of the vases made, the cost and everything else, and it would require $1,600 to do it. He said that he had made an official statement of that and furnished it to the committee with a request that they should lay it before the Senate. When they do lay it before the Senate and explain it perhaps I shall vote for the joint resolution, but I insist that a committee having that information as to the cost ought to give it to us, so that we may vote with our eyes open and not have a controversy in the Committee on Appropriations as to the propriety of voting money to carry out the law. For the purpose of having that explanation, as I do not see the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] in his seat who reported the joint resolution in the Senate, all I ask now is to enter the motion to reconsider, and perhaps he will give the information that will satisfy me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday passed the joint resolution (H. Res. 71) authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension building.

Mr. MORRILL. I think in relation to this matter there ought to be further inquiry, to know what kind of plants it is necessary to supply, whether the Pension building is to be kept as a greenhouse or hot-house, with sufficient heat there to preserve the plants during the winter season. I think it would be very difficult to do that, as it would cost a great deal of money for coal alone to supply the interior of that immense building in order to protect the plants.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say to the Senator from Vermont that I was advised by the Superintendent that in the present condition of that building it would be absolutely impossible during the winter season to comply with the joint resolution unless a fresh supply is furnished after each frost.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair informs the Senator from Kentucky that it will be necessary to recall the joint resolution from the House of Representatives, as it has gone to that body.

Mr. BECK. I will make the request, in connection with the motion to reconsider, that the other House be requested to return the joint resolution to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2889) to annex a portion of the Territory of Idaho to Washington Territory; and

A bill (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is now in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the educational bill at this time in the hope that we may complete action upon it to-day, and I shall ask the Senate to remain even beyond the ordinary hour of adjournment for that purpose.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], it will be recollected, a few days ago gave notice that yesterday he would desire to occupy the attention of the Senate in remarks upon the bill touching the Chinese question. Sickness prevented his being present at that time. He is in the Chamber this morning, and was desirous to proceed with his address to the Senate at this time, but in conversing with him I find that his health is still poor, and he is not really in a condition in which he ought to address the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to remind the Senator from New Hampshire that a motion to proceed to the consideration of the educational bill is not debatable.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that; but it seemed only just to make the statement that the Senator from Oregon desires the opportunity of being heard to-morrow morning after the completion of the morning business, at the time when the Calendar would naturally be taken up; and I desire at this time to proceed to the consideration of the educational bill, and that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], who has the floor upon that bill, may proceed with his remarks.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind Senators that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire to withhold his motion for a moment until I can make a statement.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. I had designed this morning to ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes, which is a very important bill, and for various reasons it is very desirable that it should be considered at once; but the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN], who is interested in the measure, is not able, as he states, to take the part in the debate which he desires to take. On his suggestion I think that I shall not make that motion to-day, but I wish to say to the Senate that to-morrow, when the time for the consideration of the Calendar shall have arrived, I shall move the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say in this immediate connection that the Senator from Oregon came to the Chamber hoping to be heard this morning, although really in such a physical condition that he ought not to be obliged to address the Senate; and he consented to this motion of mine to take up the educational bill at this time in the hope that he might address the Senate to-morrow morning in the morning hour. If he prefers to go on at this time, unless he could have the floor to-morrow, I shall not press the educational bill until 2 o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow me, before he renews his motion I wish to make a suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the pending bill on the Calendar reported by its title. The matter will then be open to five minutes' debate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tennessee.

Mr. DAWES. I was about to ask a favor of the Senator from New Hampshire. I have been necessarily absent from the Senate for two days. When I was last in the Senate the Indian severalty bill was pending in the morning hour. I think the debate is entirely exhausted upon it. I wish the Senator would let me try the experiment and see if it will not go through without further debate before he calls up the educational bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to withholding my motion for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. That bill is nearly at the head of the Calendar, and if there is any extended debate I shall yield to the Senator's motion.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the first two cases on the Calendar, which have gone over in consequence of the absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE], which are in his charge, may go over now without prejudice.

Mr. VOORHEES. Unless we can transact some business on the Calendar I shall have to object to postponing it.

Mr. HOAR. This is transacting business on the Calendar.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand that. My remark was not aimed at the Senator from Massachusetts, but at the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator would allow this unanimous consent to be given, so as to get those matters out of the way.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS and Mr. INGALLS. Unanimous consent to what?

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the first two measures on the Calendar, which are measures in the charge of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE], may go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A single objection is sufficient to put them over. The first two cases on the Calendar will go over without prejudice if there be no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. Do I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to suggest that the final vote on the educational bill shall be taken to-day?

Mr. BLAIR. If possible to reach it. Of course that is a matter wholly in the control of the Senate. I thought that by beginning about this time we could probably get through with the bill by perhaps remaining a little beyond the usual hour of adjournment. Perhaps it will not be necessary for the Senate to remain longer than usual.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case on the Calendar will now be reported.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not withhold my motion, unless in deference to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], who wishes to address the Chair, may give a notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case now on the Calendar will be reported, when a motion will be in order.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire submit a motion to proceed to the consideration of the educational bill?

Mr. BLAIR. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. In connection with the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire I desire to give notice that tomorrow morning, after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall request the Senate to proceed to the consideration of what is known as the Chinese bill, for the purpose of enabling me to submit some remarks upon that measure.

Mr. TELLER. I do not object to the Senator from New Hampshire taking up his educational bill, but I do object to setting any time for a vote.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not ask that.

Mr. TELLER. I think we should have a fair opportunity to discuss the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am a friend of the bill that the Senator from New Hampshire has in charge, but after an experience in this body of some years now I am satisfied that the best interests of the public service require the time usually given to the Calendar. The Calendar contains the matured work of committees, and each measure pending upon the Calendar is entitled to the consideration of the Senate whenever it is reached. It does seem to me that when a bill has the right of way from and after 2 o'clock without interference it has enough of an advantage. I say this as a friend of the bill. I would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that he had better let the interests of the Calendar be attended to during the little time that remains for it, and then go on with his measure.

Mr. BLAIR. The suggestion of the Senator from Indiana——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must still remind Senators that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. BLAIR. I yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana, but I wish to say that I am very desirous, as the Senate is, of completing the consideration of the educational bill. However, I suppose we shall probably save time by waiting until 2 o'clock.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 7, after the word "law," in line 8, it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the amendment agreed to at the end of the section, as follows:

> And every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States to whom allotments shall have been made under the provisions of this act, and every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States who has voluntarily taken up, within said limits, his residence separate and apart from any tribe of Indians therein, and has adopted the habits of civilized life, is hereby declared to be a citizen of the United States, and is entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such citizens, whether said Indian has been or not, by birth or otherwise, a member of any tribe of Indians within the territorial limits of the United States, without in any manner impairing or otherwise affecting the right of any such Indian to tribal or other property.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TELLER. Some days ago I offered an amendment to the bill, which I should like to have considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has not been offered. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I offer the amendment now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In what part of the bill does the Senator propose to insert the amendment?

Mr. TELLER. At the end of section 7. It is immaterial practically where it comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 7 the following proviso:

> Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, allow homestead settlement by citizens of the United States on each alternate quarter-section, under such rules and regulations as shall secure to the Indians their allotments as herein provided for and a proper enforcement of the intercourse laws; and for all lands so taken for homesteads by citizens of the United States there shall be proper compensation made to the Indians owning such lands under treaty stipulations or by act of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to spend any time in discussing this question, it has been so thoroughly discussed already. I only want to repeat what I have before said on various occasions, that in my judgment the benefits to be derived from this bill are very remote and are of very doubtful character. I know that for some years it has been the cry of the friends of the Indians all over the country that what was lacking was title to their lands, and that as soon as they acquired the title to their lands and a certainty that they would not be disturbed in their possession, from that time on they would enter rapidly upon the road of progress. I will admit that after a careful examination of this question I am satisfied that a great deal of trouble has arisen from the fact that the Indians have not been secure, not so much in their land as in their location, that they have been moved from one place to another as the necessities of civilization and settlement apparently demanded their absence instead of their presence.

This bill, introduced originally by the chairman of the committee several years since, has passed the Senate substantially in its present form on several occasions. The bill of itself submitting questions of allotment to the direction of the President, may not be used to the injury of the Indians; but it is a fact, which can not be disputed and which ought not to be overlooked, that so far as we have gone into the business of allotting lands to Indians, commencing many years ago down to the present time, the practical result has not been at all favorable. Little, if any, advantage has ever resulted from the allotment of lands in severalty. It never will, in my judgment, result in benefit to the Indians until such time as they shall have made some considerable progress in civilization.

The bill is based upon a false idea, and that is the old idea which has prevailed from the very commencement of our national dealings with the Indian tribes, that it is absolutely necessary for the preservation and welfare of the Indian that he be isolated from the white man, that he be kept from contact with civilization.

The honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] the other day in discussing the educational bill took occasion to speak of the marvelous progress which had been made by the black race in civilization in this country in the last two hundred years. The black race, if it had been treated exactly as we have treated the red race, would be just in the state to-day, I have no doubt, that it was when it was brought into this country. No considerable progress would have been made if the black race had been isolated from the white race on this continent, but, on the contrary, the system of servitude brought them in daily contact with the white people, and in a very short time they had forgotten their barbarism, they had forgotten the language of their native land, and they spoke in the languge of their task-masters and in that alone. Brought into daily contact as house servants, as the companions in some sense of the children of their white masters, they took in, as all people do by contact and as few people have ever taken in except by contact, the civilization that surrounded them. The Indian, on the other hand, has been kept from civilization by the provisions of law. It has been a crime for a white man to go upon his reservation; it has been a crime for a white man to sit down by his side for the purpose of teaching him civilization and progress; and the race will remain in its present ignorance and degradation just so long as in this country we maintain the stupid idea that the red man will be overcome by the vices of civilization and will be destroyed by contact with civilization and with Christianity. We set apart great tracts of country, empires in extent, and we decree the entire territory to ignorance, to degradation, and to savagery, and we lock the door against enterprise, against civilization and religion, and then we wonder at the end of a decade why no progress has been made by the Indians.

I object to this bill, because it is a continuance of a system that one hundred years of effort on our part to civilize and Christianize the Indians under have demonstrated our inability so to do. I suggested on a former bill the opening of the country, the putting side by side with the Indian farmer of a white farmer; and the chairman of the committee admitted in the presence of the Senate then (and I was glad he did, because that was one step at least in advance) that the day of the isolation of the Indian was past. It is past; it has passed; it has gone by. We can not longer isolate the Indian if we desire to do it, but we ought not to desire it. The railroads that are being constructed in every section of the country by the side of reservations and across reservations will bring these people in contact with the white element; and I say it is the duty of the friends of the Indian to take hold and see to it that they are brought into contact with the better class of whites and the better element of our civilization. No better element can be found than the men who go out and settle upon the public lands, and make for themselves honest homes. Give to our people, under such discretion as the President may exercise, the right to go upon the Indian lands and make, side by side of the Indian farm, a farm tilled by the aggressive and enterprising Anglo-Saxon, and in a little while contact alone will compel these people to accept the civilization that surrounds them on every side.

Isolate them as we have done, and they will continue as they are, although you may establish schools and churches and give them the missionary effort, and it will take ages under the present system to civilize and Christianize them. But if you can put them in the midst of an intelligent community you will have them civilized in a few years. With white settlers on every alternate section of Indian lands, there will be a school-house built, with Indian children and white children together; there will be churches at which there will be an attendance of Indians and of white people alike. They will readily learn the tongue of the white race. They will for a while speak their own language, but they will readily learn the ways of civilization.

I have, therefore, with but little hopes that the Senate will make such an innovation, but for the purpose of insisting and emphasizing as fully as I could the absurdity of continuing the old system, introduced this amendment, and unless it is accepted by the chairman of the committee who has this bill in charge I should be pleased to have the vote of the Senate and see whether the Senate are in favor of the old policy or whether they are willing, under the discretion that the Chief Executive may exercise, to start upon a new and what I think is a better plan.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado will modify his amendment by inserting in the third line of it, after the word "quarter-section," these words, "of lands upon any reservation established by executive order," I will aid him in getting it a part of this bill.

I have already said, as the Senator has intimated, that the idea upon which the amendment is based is I think the true idea. The idea of as far and as fast as possible putting the Indians among civilized people and giving them the advantage of the example and the contact and the association and every other stimulus connected with civilization promises better success than any other idea that has obtained in reference to the Indians; and therefore just so far as it can be done I am desirous of co-operating with the Senator in this idea to the extent of its application to the reservations established by executive order. It is perfectly easy, it intrenches upon no right, it disturbs no established and fixed settlement in the mind of the Indians, no title; but if you apply it to all the reservations you at once attack vested rights. The treaty reservations and the statute reservations are held by a title on the part of the Indian that it is not right for us to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to invade.

And furthermore, all this is an experiment. I am not one of those who believe that we have at any time invented a new and perfect way that will solve this question. This only gives promise, and I think an earnest and well-assured promise of working out the problem. It may not work it out as well as we hope it may. It will, I am confident, go a great way in that direction.

The idea which the Senator has suggested in his amendment is one of the ideas incorporated in this mode of trying to make something of the Indian, in my opinion a wise one, which ought to be carried as far as it can. It can be tried upon the executive-order reservations without infringing upon any rights, without disturbing any Indian with the idea that we are trying to get his land away from him. That is the greatest obstacle in the way of any attempt to make something out of the Indian at this time, the universal distrust on the part of the Indians holding land by treaty and by statute that the United States, in all its measures, has lurking under them some method by which his land is to be wrested from him.

The suggestion of the Senator is that the Secretary of the Interior can walk upon any Indian reservation held by the solemn title of a treaty, whether the Indians will or not, and take alternate sections, as many or as few as he pleases, and put white men right in among them. There is a reservation where this can be done, and where, when it is done, I believe it will be with all the beneficial effects suggested by the Senator. But there are reservations where it would work great injury, not only to the specific Indians, but to all attempts to get the Indian so that he will accept it, so that he will take from us in the spirit in which we propose it this beneficent measure of ours. True, it being left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, he may not think it wise, and probably will not, to invade such reservations against the will of the Indian; but the fact that he has the power, in the hands of the enemies of this measure would be held up before them as a matter of alarm, of concern and distrust. Any agent of the Department going among the Indians clothed with such power, whether he proposed to exercise it or not—the fact of his merely going there to see if he could—would be considered as the enemy of the Indian and be driven out in some way or other.

Now I suggest to the Senator to be content with the application of it to the executive-order reservations, and then I will do what I can to help him to get it incorporated in the bill; otherwise, and simply for the reasons I have suggested, I should hope that the Senate would not adopt the amendment in its broad sense.

Mr. TELLER. I have not any doubt of the right of the Executive on an executive-order reservation to do the very thing provided for in this bill; but it is such an innovation upon existing practice and upon existing ideas that the executive officer who should try to do it would have quite as much courage, I think, as the greatest military leader.

I want to see this principle applied to all reservations because the great mass of Indians are not on executive order reservations; the great mass of Indians are on reservations established either by treaty or by act of Congress; and we are not now treating, as we were the other day, with the Sioux tribe. This is a general statute upon which the Indians do not even have a veto. The eleventh section of this bill has been stricken out which provided that they might pass upon the question whether they would accept it or not. We are now making a general law for the government of all the Indians in the United States, and I think it is an appropriate time to announce to the world that we have departed from the old and obsolete idea that civilization was not as good as savagery, that Christianity can not come in contact with heathenism without the heathen suffering.

If the honorable Senator is tenacious and is afraid that the President of the United States will ever invade their reservation and take their lands without their being compensated, I am willing that he shall amend my amendment by putting in words which will require the compensation to be made before the land is taken. I am willing to add:

Before such settlement shall be made compensation shall be provided for.

I do not desire by legislation to deprive the Indians of any property rights they may have. I only want to put it in the power of the executive officers of the country to do the most good that can be done to that unfortunate people. I know that the great hindrance that the Department to-day finds in dealing with the Indian is that there is not proper discretion lodged in the hands of the executive branch of the Government. They have been tied up by legislative rules in such a way that they may see one part of a tribe have luxurious living while another starves, without the ability to divert the appropriations from one to another except to a limited extent; and a rule that the Department would be satisfied may work great good it is precluded from adopting, because there is no legislative authority extended to it to do so.

Every act of the executive department in its dealing with the Indians is hedged about by legislative restrictions. Discretion there is none, and I do not believe there is a department of the Government in which there is so much restriction and so much hedging about the department as there is in the Interior Department in dealing with the Indians. I want to remove some of that; and I want to place proper power in the hands of the executive officers who are responsible to the whole people of the United States with reference to this subject.

I know that it has been thought that this subject can not be dealt with except in the legislative halls, and that it is not safe to intrust it to what the quickened conscience of the whole people of the United States demands from every executive officer, exactness in conduct and rectitude in purpose when he deals with Indians, which it does not demand in any other department of the Government. There is no danger that any man who administers the office of Secretary of the Interior will ever invade the rights of the Indians. He may, and he will if he is an intelligent man, run counter to the Indian Rights Association, or the Indian Defense Association, or the people who know nothing of Indians except as they have learned it through Fenimore Cooper's novels or some authority of that character. There is no such danger.

If the Senator thinks it is necessary to provide compensation before the lands are taken, I am willing he should offer that amendment, or if my amendment should be acceptable with that clause added to it, I should be glad to make that change myself.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator does not feel like adopting the amendment I suggested, I hope the Senate will vote down his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to say a word, more to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado than anything else. The proposition that he presents in this amendment is one that if it were carried into the statutes would require very great elaboration and detail. It ought to be the subject of a separate bill. This subject has not been brought to the attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is put for the first time before the Senate, as I understand, by this proposed amendment late in the consideration of this bill.

Now, there is one feature of this amendment which I wish to call to the special attention of the Senator from Colorado:

Under such rules and regulations as shall secure to the Indians their allotments as herein provided for, and a proper enforcement of the intercourse laws.

How would it be possible that the Secretary of the Interior could provide rules and regulations for the proper enforcement of the intercourse laws when the whole of the reservations of the Indians were spotted over with white men who had settled there and had got title to the property? "Alternate sections." The Senator says it must be in alternate sections. I do not know whether the Indians are to take the odd-numbered or the even-numbered sections, or when the Indian has made his location then the alternate section on which an Indian is located may not be devoted to the homestead of a white man.

The measure which the Senator proposes here must be one of growth. Of course we know that all this western country at some future day must be populated jointly by Indians and white people; but until the Indians get into condition where they can be protected against the white men who would sell them whisky, sell them powder and shot, and out-deal them in all their transactions, it is the duty of the Government of the United States to preserve them in some form or other until they have matured sufficiently to become able to control their own domestic affairs; I mean their household affairs, and manage their own property.

I do not know of anything that could be worse to-day than to settle the Arapaho and Cheyenne and Kiowa and Comanche Indians upon allotments of land in severalty throughout that broad expanse of the Indian country; and then to allow white men to go in and take the alternate sections. They are confirmed savages; a great many of them are almost wholly untutored; they are not fit for civilized society, and men with nice families and who desire to prosper in the world would not be very apt to go in there. We should get a ruffian class of population among those Indians, and we should be in so much trouble with them that we should not get clear of it in fifty years to come, in my opinion. I hope the Senator will be content to frame a bill, for which he will receive support as has been indicated in the Senate from various quarters, moving upon this subject gradually. Let his bill first apply to those Indian reservations where the Indians have some knowledge of affairs, and where they are calculated in some sense to take care of themselves. We can provide by law so that the white people can go and settle among them, and doubtless many of the tribes would welcome the white people among them; but to make a broadcast measure of that kind and to leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to indulge in legislation of the most important character by the mere adoption of rules and regulations, it seems to me would be a very unfortunate movement at this time.

I hope the Senator will not press his amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I wonder the Senator from Alabama overlooked the fact that the intercourse laws with rare exceptions—and those in the Indian Territory—are not Territorial in their character. The intercourse laws depend upon the relation that the Indian bears to the General Government. If he is a member of a tribe it is as much an offense against the intercourse laws to sell him ardent spirits in the city of Washington as it would be on his reservation. Therefore there can be nothing in that objection, because if every other settler was a white man in a reservation, a sale by a white man or an Indian on the reservation or off the reservation of intoxicating drinks to an Indian is a violation of the intercourse laws.

I admit that this is a subject which will require some detail; I understand that. What I complain of is that any law which we might attempt to pass through this body would necessarily require so much detail that it would be very doubtful whether we should ever get it passed, and if we did whether with all the wisdom of this body and all the wisdom that could be thrown upon it by the other House it would not be found in practical operation that there had been some things omitted. In my judgment the whole subject can better be remitted to the executive department of the Government under the general authority of a statute which says you may do this, subject to such conditions as you think will promote the interest and welfare of the Indians. I do not suppose any Secretary would think of putting now in the present condition of things white people in the Cheyenne territory. That would be a question of discretion for the executive department of the Government. I think we may safely leave all such things to the executive department, and not attempt to provide in detail for every little thing that might arise in the carrying out of such a principle.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAXEY. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to section 9. In that section I move to strike out, from line 2, the words "reservations of" and insert "territory occupied by;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 9. That the provision of this act shall not extend to the territory occupied by the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Seminoles, and Osages in the Indian Territory, nor to any of the reservations of the Seneca Nation of New York Indians in the State of New York.

Mr. DAWES. That is a verbal correction and it ought to be made.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to state why I offer the amendment, in order to put the reason on record.

The word "reservations" in that connection is a very broad expression. By striking out the word "reservations," which has a fixed idea of title, and inserting "territory," we reach the object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The word "provision," at the beginning of the sentence, will be changed to "provisions," if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILBUR F. STEELE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 1223) for the relief of Wilbur F. Steele was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice if there be no objection.

ARKANSAS HOT SPRINGS.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution reported by Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, February 1, 1886, relative to bath-house and hot-water privileges on the Government reservation at Hot Springs, Ark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The resolution was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out the words "until proper legislation is had with reference thereto" and insert "until the Forty-ninth Congress shall adjourn without having legislated with reference thereto;" so as to make the resolution read:

Whereas the leases heretofore made of the bath-house and hot-water privileges upon the reservation of Government lands at Hot Springs, Ark., have expired by limitation of law; and

Whereas the Attorney-General of the United States has given an opinion that such lease may be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior without additional legislation:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the opinion of Congress such leases of bath-house and hot-water privileges should not be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior unless the Forty-ninth Congress shall adjourn without having legislated with reference thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

STATUES TO COLUMBUS, LAFAYETTE, AND JAMES A. GARFIELD.

The joint resolution (S. R. 35) setting apart public reservations for statues to Columbus, Lafayette, and James A. Garfield was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe there will be no objection to the passage of this joint resolution at the present time.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like the Senator from Vermont to explain the joint resolution. Under the act authorizing the Garfield statue the commission appointed was authorized to select the ground for its location, and they did locate it and they made a contract for the statue. I am afraid if we change the location it may interfere somewhat with the contract. I think myself that notwithstanding there are a number of bills for the location of statues, they ought all to be in charge of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds so as to secure uniformity in the selection.

Mr. MORRILL. There will be no sort of difficulty in changing the location so far as the artist is concerned. I desire to say further, in relation to the contract of the Secretary of War with the artist, that it is provided that it shall have only an excavation of 6 feet. That will be entirely insufficient. The naval monument had to have an excavation of over 30 feet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why did he make the contract, then?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know. Under the circumstances it would be well to change the contract, and there is not the slightest doubt of the willingness of the artist to make the change.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. CONGER. On the passage of the joint resolution I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is still detained at home by serious illness. I am generally paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. Did he vote on this question?

Mr. ALLISON. I did not.

Mr. COCKRELL. On general questions I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, and as he did not vote I believe I will vote "nay."

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senator from Vermont if he will not agree to a reconsideration of the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading for the purpose of amending the resolution so as to give charge to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I think it is proper they should have the selection of all the sites and not have a separate commission in each case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Debate is not in order. The roll-call must be concluded.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. On political questions I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], but I presume this is not considered such, and to make a quorum I will vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Beck,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Berry,	Gibson,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Blackburn,	Gray,	Miller of N. Y.,	Spooner,

So the joint resolution was passed.

ALBERT H. EMERY.

The bill (S. 929) for the relief of Albert H. Emery was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will have to go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, will be passed over.

Mr. HOAR. I hope it will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that; but it is one of the matters that will have to be debated. I do not object to its keeping its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 124) to print 31,000 copies of the eulogies on Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 150) to quiet title to settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 3827) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Rosser, of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. 3846) to remove the disabilities of Alexander P. Stewart, of La Fayette County, Mississippi; and

A bill (H. R. 4409) to remove the disabilities of Edward G. W. Butler, of Missouri.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

The bill (S. 1302) authorizing the appointment of an assistant Secretary of the Navy, and fixing the salary for the same, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, goes over under the rule.

CRIMES BY INDIANS.

The bill (S. 1100) to amend the ninth section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the section named so as to read:

SEC. 9. That immediately upon and after the date of the passage of this act all Indians committing against the person or property of another Indian or other person any of the following crimes, namely, murder, manslaughter, rape, assault with intent to kill, arson, burglary, or larceny, within any Territory of the United States, and either within or without an Indian reservation, shall be subject therefor to the laws of such Territory relating to said crimes, and shall be tried therefor in the same courts and in the same manner, and shall be subject to the same penalties, as are all other persons charged with the commission of said crimes respectively; and the said courts are hereby given jurisdiction in all such cases: Provided, That in all cases where any of said crimes shall be committed against the person or property of another Indian the judge of the court before which such Indian may be tried shall certify to the Attorney-General of the United States the cost of the apprehension and trial of such Indian, and the Attorney-General shall cause the same to be reimbursed to the Territory, or any county thereof, incurring the same, out of funds that may be available or appropriated for that purpose: And provided further, That the cost of the support and maintenance of Indians convicted of any of said crimes against the person or property of another Indian, and sentenced to imprisonment, shall be borne by the United States. And all Indians committing any of the above crimes against the person or property of another Indian or other person within the boundaries of any State of the United States and within the limits of any Indian reservation, or within the limits of any portion of the Indian Territory and not set apart for and occupied by the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, or Seminole Indian tribes, shall be subject to the same laws, tried in the same courts and in the same manner, and be subject to the same penalties as are all other persons committing any of the above crimes within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to explain this matter; and we can see what the law was before.

Mr. DAWES. In the last Congress in an appropriation bill was inserted a provision making Indians who commit offenses against Indians upon reservations and outside the reservations amenable to the criminal laws of the country as to certain crimes specified, the same crimes which are specified in this bill. In putting it into practical operation it has been found to work in this way, that the Indians upon reservations are taken to a court in some county that has no Indian reservation in it, and the costs of the trial all fall upon that county. Not only is the burden a great deal, but the public sentiment in the county against the prosecution comes from that source to be so great that it paralyzes the law.

The Interior Department had its attention called to this as well as the Indian Committee, and at the suggestion of some members of the committee the law officers of the Government prepared this bill which merely causes the costs of such prosecutions to be paid on the certificate of the Attorney-General, out of the Treasury of the United States. They can not be paid out of the treasury of the county where the crime is committed, because that is an Indian reservation; and they must be paid out of the taxable property of the poor county that holds the court unless they are paid in this way. That is all there is to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like a minute to see what the old law is.

Mr. PLATT. Let me inquire whether the effect of this bill is to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Territorial courts?

Mr. DAWES. Not at all. This bill follows the words of the existing law except as to the question of costs. It would have been proper, I may add, to have this bill go to the Committee on the Judiciary; but it was thought, as the Committee on Indian Affairs had knowledge of the evils, they were so apparent, that the Committee on the Judiciary would have more trouble in finding out the meaning of the thing than they would in acquiescing.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UMATILLA INDIAN LANDS.

The bill (S. 1210) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make sale of certain lands of the Umatilla Indian reservation, in Oregon, to William S. Byers and others, and to issue patents therefor, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to have an amount of land, not to exceed 20 acres, upon the Umatilla Indian reservation, in Oregon, immediately adjoining on the east a tract of 640 acres set apart as an additional town site for the town of Pendleton by an act of Congress, approved August 5, 1882, surveyed by the surveyor-general of Oregon in such shape as will best embrace and secure the mill-race and water-head of William S. Byers, Robert G. Thompson, and Jeremiah Barnhart, as the same is now located and used in connection with their mill in the town of Pendleton, and, when such survey shall have been completed, to have the lands included within the limits thereof appraised by the surveyor-general at their actual value, and thereupon to have the plat and field-notes of such survey and the amount of the appraisement of such lands returned to and filed in the office of the Secretary; and thereupon, and upon the approval thereof by the Secretary, it shall be lawful for him to make sale of the lands at their appraised value to Byers, Thompson, and Barnhart; and upon payment by them in full of the purchase price thereof, together with all costs and expenses incurred in the premises, the Secretary shall cause a patent to be issued to them for the lands purchased. The moneys to be realized from the sale of the lands are to be placed to the credit of the confederated tribes of the Umatilla, Walla Walla, and Cayuse Indians, now resident upon the reservation, and be held and managed in like manner and in connection with similar funds now existing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any report about that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no written report. The bill is reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill:

Provided, That this act shall in no way impair or affect any existing right to a reasonable use of the water of said stream for agricultural purposes, nor shall confirm or grant any right to use the water thereof in any manner nor to any extent beyond or different from that to which it has been heretofore appropriated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the bill explained.

Mr. DAWES. There is a town called Pendleton, a very flourishing town, built just upon the border of this reservation. There is a stream running by this town which has a water-power upon it. Certain individuals, of whom the men named in this bill are the assignees who hold under the original persons, obtained a verbal license from the Interior Department to construct a ditch from the falls in that river across a portion of the Indian reservation to this town of Pendleton, where they erected a flouring mill. There was a law passed at the last Congress appointing three commissioners to treat with these Indians, and get their title to a portion of this land adjoining Pendleton in order to enlarge the area of that town. In that bill was a provision substantially like this bill when this proviso is added.

These men lose all the privileges which they obtained by the verbal license in the absence of legislation. They have invested quite a large capital in this flouring mill, all dependent upon the right to take the water in this ditch, which they constructed under a verbal license. That law, by the way, has failed in its operation because the Indians would not give their consent to the negotiations entered into on the part of the Government by the commissioners, so that that law as yet has not prevailed, and these persons obtained no portion of the land. Now this bill is introduced to grant to these persons the land along this ditch, to appraise its value, and to give a patent for it to these parties, and the appraised value of it goes into the Treasury for the use of the Indians.

If it were granted without any condition it would be in the power of these men to appropriate the entire stream, and it is understood by the committee that the town of Pendleton is dependent upon this stream for all its water as well as these people are for their power, and the Committee on Indian Affairs were of opinion that possibly for irrigating purposes, agricultural purposes, the right to take water out of this stream would be impaired if this grant were made without condition. Hence, while they thought it was reasonable and fair that these persons who had constructed their ditch across the corner of the reservation under a verbal license from the Interior Department should have a permanent right to do it in order that the capital they had invested upon the strength of this license might not be useless to them, yet that it was highly important that the grant should go no futher than the present use, and that there should be excepted out of it all other uses to which the water might be put, so that the town of Pendleton might not be taxed by these individuals. They might take all this water and the town of Pendleton might be obliged to buy it of them, or agriculturists might desire this water for agricultural purposes and be cut off. It was thought that these men would have all that they were justly and fairly entitled to if the grant extended to their present use of the water.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I notice that this amendment of the committee, a very proper one providing for reserving existing rights to a reasonable use of the water for agricultural purposes as a limitation of the confirmation, says from that use "to which it has been heretofore appropriated." I think the word "lawfully" ought to be inserted before "appropriated," and I make that motion to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting the word "lawfully," so that they shall not get anything more than they are now lawfully entitled to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAWES. That would raise the question whether this verbal license to use it to its present extent would be a lawful use.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, it would. If the verbal license given by the Secretary of the Interior was a piracy upon the rights of these Indians and therefore affected the value of this land that we are going to take from them and give to these mill-owners, and it was an illegal and void license, then they ought not to get anything from the advantage of the license in respect to this water which the town wants and which the Indians want, and therefore to affirm any unlawful use that they are making of the water—I am not on the subject of the land—would be a little further than I wish to go.

Mr. DAWES. These men would find that they had taken nothing but a paper if this amendment were adopted. I may be mistaken about it. I shall leave it to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall oppose this amendment, and desire to present the facts in this case; but I see it is 2 o'clock now, and I suppose the bill will go over in its present shape until to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are two other amendments which I have written in pencil in the body of the bill that I wish to call the attention of the Senate to when the matter comes up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the unfinished business will be taken up.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2889) to annex a portion of the Territory of Idaho to Washington Territory was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories; and

The bill (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator give way to me for a moment only to give notice to the Senator from New Hampshire that at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi I may feel constrained to move that the Senate go into executive session to attend to some important business before the Senate in that way. I wish to give the notice to the Senator from New Hampshire now who is in charge of this bill. The business I have in mind will probably take most of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the people of Mississippi, all classes, have so much interest in this subject that I shall feel constrained to trespass further upon the attention of the Senate in presenting some further views in advocacy of the bill.

Yesterday I called the attention of the Senate to the precedents in the legislation of the country which I thought justified the constitutionality of this measure. One of the precedents to which I alluded was a resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama and passed, I think, by the Senate some years ago donating to the employés of this body a month's extra pay. I did not mention that for the purpose of complaining of the action of the Senate, but of calling attention to the fact that money was being continually appropriated by Congress for purposes outside of the specially enumerated powers in the Constitution. I said then and I say now that there was no justification in the Constitution for an appropriation by way of gift to the employés of this body other than such as might come from the words in the Constitution which authorize Congress to levy and collect taxes, &c., to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

The Senator from Alabama corrected me as to the purport of the resolution to which I was referring, and said that that resolution applied only to the employés of the Senate whose pay continued merely during the session of the Senate, and he justified this extra pay upon the ground that it was necessary to enable these parties to live during the vacation of the Senate. I was under the impression then that the Senator from Alabama was wrong, but I was not sure of it. I have looked into that matter since, and I have caused a copy of that resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama to be made, which I will now read to the Senate. The resolution was offered July 17, 1882, and is found on page 6129 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session Forty-seventh Congress. The resolution is in these words:

Resolved, That there shall be allowed and paid to the employés of the Senate (including the Capitol police) receiving an annual compensation, who were employed on the 4th day of March, 1881, or on the 15th day of December, 1881, a sum equal to one month's pay at the rate per annum they were receiving at the dates specified herein, and that a sum equal to one month's pay shall be allowed and paid to the session employés of the Senate who shall be so employed at the adjournment of the present session.

Mr. MORGAN. What became of that resolution?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not remember.

Mr. MORGAN. We very often out of kindness to our friends around the Capitol introduce resolutions in order to have them referred to the proper committee. I do not suppose the Senator thinks I am committed to every constitutional absurdity that ever was enacted in the world, as he seems to think he is obliged to be, because at the request of some friend I offered a resolution in the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the first time I ever heard it announced that a Senator had a right to make a proposition to violate the Constitution of the United States out of courtesy for his friends. I had supposed that the Constitution was equally binding upon us, binding upon our conscience, whether we were called upon to act under it in favor of our friends or in favor of the people at large. And that remark of the Senator reminds me of what I had heard before, that in his opposition to the general-welfare clause of the Constitution allowing appropriations for the general welfare he was more inclined to seek methods of getting money out of the Treasury when it was simply for the private welfare of some particular individuals.

Mr. MORGAN. That remark is unjust to me. I do not wish to follow the Senator in his detailed effort to lay before the world what little of my record he thinks is worthy of examination; doubtless he can find a great many things in it to object to; but in paying the employés of the Senate we have an unquestioned right, if we employ a man at $50 a month and it is not enough, to pay him $100 a month, without violating the Constitution or any precendent. And so we have certainly the right when employés have been brought here, and especially when the Senate has changed its politics by the coming in of new members, to say to these men who have come here, "You have lost your business at home; you have been put to unnecessary and unexpected expense; and we think it but just and equitable that we should reward you or compensate you." That is the first Senator who ever had the capacity of ascertaining that there was the slightest hint of unconstitutionality in a proceeding of that kind. I never heard one before on this floor, as long as I have been here, intimate that there was any restraint upon the power of the Senate to apply such moneys as the two Houses would vote, out of its contingent fund or out of any fund under its control, for the purpose of giving to its own officers just and reasonable compensation. The Senator is welcome to make all he can out of such trash as that which he may be able to find in my record.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very much obliged to the honorable Senator for the complimentary manner in which he has alluded to my remarks. It so happens that when a Senator undertakes to follow the course of the Senator from Alabama he is compelled by the necessity of the case to deal with trash, for there is little else in the record of the Senator except what can be denominated by the word "trash."

The Senator says it is the first time he ever heard it intimated on this floor that it was a violation of the Constitution to pay the employés of the Senate an extra compensation—the first time he ever heard it intimated that such an appropriation was in violation of the Constitution. He has not heard that to-day. I made no such intimation. I only said that on the absurd and ridiculous construction of the Constitution which the Senator from Alabama insists upon, tested by that rule, the appropriation was unconstitutional.

Mr. President, my attention has been called by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] to several other precedents, coming down to the very present time, which justify the legislation now proposed by this bill. In looking at one of last year's appropriation bills, framed by a committee upon which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is a member, I find provisions which can not be justified except upon the construction of the Constitution insisted upon by the advocates of this bill. I find:

For the introduction by the United States Fish Commission into and the increase in the waters of the United States of food-fishes and other useful products of the waters, including lobsters, oysters, and other shell-fish, and for continuing the inquiry into the fisheries of the United States and their subjects, and for such general and miscellaneous expenditures as the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries may find necessary to the prosecution of his work, including salaries or compensation of all necessary employés, $130,000.

I find also an appropriation—

For the preparation and maintenance of fish-ponds in Washington and elsewhere, &c.

I find appropriations also for "Fish Commission buildings, Wood's Holl, Mass.," and for sailing vessels to propagate food-fishes.

I find also an appropriation of $300,000 to aid the State and local boards of health in the arrest of epidemic diseases. I find a million dollars appropriated to take care of the weather—for the Signal Service—to make reports for the benefit of agriculture and commerce. I should like to know under what clause of the Constitution these appropriations were made, unless under the clause on which we rely who advocate this bill.

But passing now from the precedents and looking somewhat at the arguments which have been urged for and against the construction of the Constitution upon which we rely, let me state now that construction, so that there can be no mistake as to our view with relation to that matter.

No Senator on this side of the Chamber who advocates this bill insists, so far as I know, that under that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to levy taxes to pay the debts, to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States—no Senator contends that that confers upon Congress a substantive and independent power outside of the powers enumerated in subsequent clauses of the Constitution. Our position is that this clause gives Congress power to make the appropriation—nothing more. That was the distinction taken by Mr. Monroe; that was the distinction taken by Mr. Calhoun; and that is the distinction which has been taken by all the statesmen who concur in our view of the Constitution. It is unjust to say that when we make an appropriation, or ask for an appropriation under that clause of the Constitution, we insist or acknowledge that Congress can do more than that, and I here distinctly disavow upon my part and upon the part of the friends of this measure on this side of the Chamber that we hold that Congress can do anything more in relation to education than make an appropriation in aid of the States. And, sir, that is the plain meaning of this bill itself. It contained a disclaimer, as it was introduced by the Committee on Education and Labor, of any assertion of any power on the part of Congress to do anything more than that. That disclaimer is contained in these words:

SEC. 7. That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided.

Mr. BUTLER. That was struck out.

Mr. GEORGE. I was just coming to that. It was struck out on the motion of the Senator who has just interrupted me, and his motion, I believe, was sustained by every single Senator on this side of the Chamber who opposes the bill.

When we who advocate this bill, when Senators on the other side who advocate this bill, are willing to put in it a positive disclaimer of the powers which the Senators on this side who oppose it assert that the bill implies, we find those very same Senators fearing, as they say they fear, that the bill will be quoted as a precedent for the power of Congress to take charge of education in the States, one of them making a motion and the others voting to sustain that motion to strike that disclaimer from the bill. Now, sir, I am not to inquire into the motives of Senators who cast that vote. They had a right to do it if they saw proper. They had a right to strike out the clause if they had power enough to do it. But I say that when this disclaimer was reported in the bill, a disclaimer of power, the Senators who opposed the bill because, as they assert, it contained by implication the power thus expressly repudiated, when they vote to strike that disclaimer from the bill are estopped from saying that it implies the power thus disclaimed and repudiated. We who support the bill, in order to close out forever any inference that it meant to assert the power on the part of Congress to interfere with the school system of the States, put that disclaimer in the bill, and the Senators who oppose the bill on the ground that such power must be necessarily implied come in and vote to strike out the disclaimer.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not consider it an intrusion for me to make a suggestion.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly not.

Mr. MORGAN. I voted for that amendment because I wanted to strip the bill of all unnecessary disguises. The bill without that clause did exactly what the bill did with it. So says the Senator. If you strike it out, what else does it do? The bill with that stricken out means that the States are not to receive a subvention under this bill which they can themselves control, but that the power of Congress attends the appropriation within the State and controls its exercise there.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the answer to that is a very plain one. There was controversy as to what this bill meant. The Senator from Alabama and those who agree with him on this side of the Chamber said it meant that the power was asserted by Congress to control and manage education in the schools of the States. The Senators on this side of the Chamber who supported the bill denied that such implication was proper, and we put in the bill a disclaimer of the power which the Senator says existed or is asserted by the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Would it interrupt my friend for me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Not at all.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to call his attention to the provision of the bill which prescribes what shall be taught in the common schools of the respective States and ask him if in his judgment that does not assume jurisdiction of the common schools? I also made a motion to strike that out, but it was voted down.

Mr. GEORGE. I intended to notice that further on, but I will do it now. Every bill for the grant to the States of land for schools of the sixteenth sections has been a grant for the purpose of establishing and maintaining common schools. What is taught in common schools? Reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and speaking the English language. That is exactly what a common school is. That is what everybody understands when a common school is established will be taught in it; and yet this bill merely specifies in plain language the subjects which are always taught in common schools. Does it make any difference whether we say that this fund shall go for the purpose of aiding in the establishment of common schools and in the teaching of such studies as are usually taught in them, or whether we specify reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and speaking the English language? What else could be taught in a common school, or rather how could a common school be established without teaching these things?

Mr. BUTLER. Then I ask what necessity for specifying them?

Mr. GEORGE. That is a mere matter of taste, not a matter of constitutional law. It is a matter of taste whether it be specified or whether it be left to inference. We are talking now about the Constitution.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator asserts the constitutional right of Congress to take charge of common schools.

Mr. GEORGE. No more than if it had said you shall teach in these schools the studies which are usually taught in common schools.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not say that?

Mr. GEORGE. Can you have a common school without any studies in it at all? How will you establish a common school, I ask the Senator from South Carolina, without teaching reading, without teaching writing, without teaching arithmetic? That would be a very uncommon school, as suggested by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. The object of this appropriation is to educate the illiterate. The object of the common school is to educate the illiterate. Would the Senator commence at the other end of the line? Would he introduce into the common school the study of transcendental metaphysics?

Mr. BUTLER. No, Mr. President, I will tell you where I would begin. I would begin and end just exactly where the States of this Union leave the question. That is where I would begin and end.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, Mr. President, the framers of this measure and the framers of other measures making donations to the States for the purpose of education have done it. Here is the agricultural land grant made in 1862 for agricultural colleges. Nobody ever denied but that was a constitutional law, and yet that contained an enumeration of the studies, and among others military tactics. There is nothing in that idea.

But, Mr. President, I am not going over the argument which I went over two years ago in favor of the construction of the Constitution that Congress has the right to make an appropriation, outside of the enumerated clauses in the Constitution, under the general-welfare clause of the taxing part of the Constitution. That argument has been made and repeated by the greatest men who have lived in this country. It is unnecessary for me to repeat it now, but I will answer some objections which have been urged to it. On a former day during this discussion I asserted that this bill contained a mere gift to the States in aid of ed-nation, interrupting the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. He replied in this way:

And that being true—

That is, the consent of the donee being required to make a particular gift—

there is no power in the Constitution of the United States for the United States Government to send a gift to a State, for there is no power in the Constitution which hints at the idea that Congress may do something with the consent of the State which it can not do without it.

I replied:

Can we make a gift to a foreign state?

Mr. MORGAN. I am speaking about the relations between our States and our Government.

The debate proceeded:

Mr. GEORGE. I want to know if Congress can make a gift to a foreign state, as was done during the administration of General Washington?

Mr. MORGAN. With due respect to the honorable Senator, that is a begging of the question and a refuge besides.

Mr. GEORGE. If you can make a gift to a foreign state, can you not to your own?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir. If the Senator has not learned enough of horn-book constitutional law to understand the difference between the relations of the Federal Government to a foreign state and of the Federal Government to the States of the Federal Union, I shall have to take back what I said a while ago about his being a profound constitutional lawyer. [Laughter.] No, sir; the Senator saw that he was in a hole, and he could not get out of it without taking refuge in a foreign state.

I repeat the proposition, it does require a donor and a consenting donee to perfect a gift; and inasmuch as there is no hint of power in the Constitution by which an act of Congress is to become complete by the consent of a State, your case is gone.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any hint in the Constitution that any act of Congress shall become complete with the consent of a foreign state or a private individual?

Mr. MORGAN. I have too much respect for the gentleman who taught me the elementary principles of law to answer that question. I really have.

Further on he said:

The Senator from New Hampshire thinks he can give the money to the children. Probably he can. He can not give it to the State, because the State can not consent to accept it, so as to confer on Congress a power it does not possess to make the gift.

Now I propose to make some remarks upon that proposition in issue between the Senator from Alabama and myself. He says that Congress can not make a gift to a State. If so, why not? Congress makes gifts to everybody else. Congress makes gifts, as the Senator admitted, to foreign states, makes gifts to individuals, makes gifts to classes, makes gifts to corporations. Why can not the Congress of the United States make a gift to a State? Is it because the State is incapable of being a donee? Is it a fact, does the Senator from Alabama assert it as a fact, that a State can not be made a donee, can not accept a gift from any one? If so, he is in contravention to the legal and constitutional history of this country.

Then if Congress is competent to make a gift and if the State is competent to accept a gift, what prevents a gift from going from Congress to the State? Here is a donor with power to give, here is a donee with power to accept. By what process of reasoning can you prevent a gift from going from this donor to this donee?

But the Senator from Alabama did not believe in his own theory on that subject. I find on page 12 of the twenty-third volume of the Statutes at Large an act of Congress, introduced by the Senator from Alabama, advocated by him, and through his agency passing the Congress of the United States. That act says:

That 46,080 acres of the public lands in Alabama are hereby granted to the State of Alabama in addition to the lands reserved to said State, &c.

Here are lands granted without consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. For what purpose?

Mr. GEORGE. For the use of the University of Alabama. I am only quoting it now to show that Congress can make a gift, that a State can accept a gift, and that Congress can make a gift directly to a State. There is the answer to the proposition of the Senator from Alabama denying the power to make such a gift. Here is an act of Congress, introduced by the Senator from Alabama himself, which makes a gift by Congress to a State. Will the Senator say we can give land and can not give money?

I propose to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a proposition made by the Senator from Alabama upon this same subject. His proposition was this:

I think that a bill framed upon an idea like this in the first section would be a bill that would meet with general acceptance on the part of Congress and be exactly in harmony with the whole course of our legislation since 1799:

"That the sum of $650,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended as hereinafter provided, to aid in the execution of such quarantine and health laws of any State respecting any vessel arriving in, or bound to, any port or district thereof, or respecting any person or thing bound to, or arriving in, any place in the United States from any foreign state or country."

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask him if this whole matter of jurisdiction over commerce at large is not a matter of co-operation with the authorities of the States?

Mr. GEORGE. That may be to some extent true, but I am quoting from a Senator who in the very speech from which I read this proposition denied that concurrent jurisdiction. He said that this whole matter was within the jurisdiction of the States and opposed the measure as it then stood upon that ground, and offered only to support it upon the terms which I have just read.

I have no doubt at all—

Said he—

that whenever a great calamity like this visits any part of the United States, whether it visits its people, or whether it visits its property, or animals useful for human food or human service, it is entirely within the purview of Congress to render assistance to the local laws and the local agencies for the purpose of resisting such a calamity.

Here, then, the Senator from Alabama has introduced and secured the passage of a bill giving land to a State; here is his proposition to give $650,000 to the States, denying all the time, as we deny, that this gift, this grant conferred any jurisdiction or power on the agencies of the Federal Government to interfere with the local concerns of the States, but simply to act in aid of the States. So, Mr. President, we have one of the distinguished Senators who oppose this bill on record here in favor of gifts to the States by Congress to aid the States in the discharge of their proper constitutional functions.

I pass now to another very important precedent on this subject, in which nearly all the Senators on this side of the Chamber who oppose this bill figured to some extent. There was introduced in March, 1879, by Mr. Burnside, a bill sometimes called the Burnside bill and sometimes the Morrill bill. I propose to bring the contents of that bill before the Senate as a precedent for this bill. I propose to show its history, what was said and done, how it was explained, how it was amended, what powers were proposed to be exercised by Congress in passing it, and what influence those powers were supposed to have upon the States. The bill, as I said, was introduced by Mr. Burnside. It was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, of which committee my friend from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] was at that time, I believe, a member. They concurred in reporting the bill back with some amendments. Let us see what that bill proposed to do and how that affects the question now before the Senate.

In the first place, that bill is supposed at times to give the proceeds of the sale of public lands to education, and yet that is not true. The bill as introduced probably was different, but as it was amended and passed it made no such provision. As the bill was introduced it read in this way:

That the net proceeds of said sales and receipts for patents shall be set apart as an educational fund, and shall be invested in the bonds of the United States, bearing a rate of interest not less than 4 per cent. per annum, both principal and interest payable in coin.

When it came before this body the above provision was amended so as to read—

Provided, That the net proceeds of said sales and receipts for patents shall be set apart as an educational fund, and shall be entered on the books of the Treasury to the credit of the fund, and bearing a rate of interest not less than 4 per cent. per annum.

There was no appropriation of this fund; not one dollar of it ever went out of the Treasury or was intended to go out of the Treasury by the bill. What is meant by setting apart is in fact nothing. There was no direction that the sum, say of $5,000,000, accruing in any one year from the sales of the public lands and from fees on patents should be taken bodily by the Treasurer and put in a particular vault, laid away securely for the purpose of being used in supporting or aiding in supporting common schools in the State. The setting apart was simply this, and nothing more: The dollars, so far as they were affected by this bill, remained in the Treasury as they came there; they were like dollars coming from customs, coming from internal-revenue taxes, coming from any other source by which dollars can get into the Treasury and wholly mixed with and unseparated and undistinguished from them. They were physically and corporeally not set apart; they were mingled as a part of the common treasure and common fund in the Treasury of the United States. All that was done (and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to that) was that the simple arithmetical figures corresponding to the amount of these dollars was directed to be entered on a book in the Treasury Department, and that on the figures thus entered the United States were required to pay 4 per cent. interest to the States.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me to say that I was a member of the Committee on Education and Labor at the time that bill was reported, and if I now remember correctly the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and Mr. Burnside and myself were a subcommittee. The receipts of the Patent Office were included in that bill, not one dollar of which was ever raised from the people of the United States under the clause of the Constitution "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." It is simply the receipt of a certain fee for the issue of patents over and above the expenses necessary for that issue. There is to the credit of that fund about $300,000, I think. That was provided for in that bill because after discharging the duty for which the money was paid this much was left over and was deposited with the United States like any other deposit. It is not money raised by taxation.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not making any point now on the fact that the proceeds of the Patent Office were set apart, but I am making the point that there was actually no appropriation or transfer at all of either the patent fees or the land receipts. The whole thing was only a change in the system of book-keeping. But to make this thing perfectly understood, here are, say, $5,000,000 coming into the Treasury from the proceeds of public lands. That money was not given to the States; it was not locked up in any particular box or vault for the use of the States; it was to go, after the passage of the bill, just as it went before, into the general fund, and was to be paid out of the general fund to general purposes in the ordinary way and in the discharge of the ordinary expenses of the Government. The money coming from these funds was not in any way disturbed in the Treasury; it was neither enlarged nor diminished, nor was its use in the slightest degree changed. All remained exactly as before, except an entry on the books of the Treasury. There was nothing done or authorized to be done by this bill except to enter upon the books of the Treasury Department the number in figures of the dollars thus received as a basis upon which a donation was to be made out of the general Treasury to the States. If $5,000,000 come in during the year from this source the dollars are not separated from the other money or in anywise distinguished from them. The Treasurer enters according to the bill on the books of the Treasury Department $5,000,000 creditor to the educational fund, and upon that 4 per cent. is calculated and paid to the States under the bill, amounting to $200,000, and that sum is not paid out of that fund but paid out of the general fund of the Treasury. In other words, if it be constitutional to pay out the proceeds of the public lands and the patent fees to the States in aid of education and unconstitutional to pay out any other money, then you have accomplished nothing by this Burnside bill in the way of making it constitutional. The money paid out under that bill came from all the funds in the Treasury from whatever source derived. It in fact made an appropriation for education out of these general funds. If that bill was constitutional and this unconstitutional, this results not from any difference in the substance of the two either as to the funds to be paid out or the object of the appropriation, but comes only from the fact that a certain entry was directed by the Burnside bill to be made on the books of the Treasury. If the Constitution was saved in the Burnside bill and destroyed by this, this salvation and destruction came only by a difference in the mode of book-keeping in the Treasury.

So, Mr. President, if you construe the bill as it really meant, it was a donation out of the general fund of the Treasury in aid of common schools.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to say to the Senator from Mississippi in regard to that bill that he has stated more than is justified by the facts. We had the entire right to devote the fund there mentioned to the purpose there provided.

Mr. GEORGE. I was just going to read something from the Senator from Texas which I think controverts the idea he now states. During the progress of that bill, which proposed out of the general funds of the United States to pay 4 per cent. to the States, the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Eaton, said that the United States could borrow money at 3 per cent., and that it was wrong that the United States should pay to the States a larger per cent. for money than they could get it in market. Mr. Hill, of Georgia, then on this floor, objected to the reduction of the interest, admitting, as everybody then did admit, that the United States could borrow money at 3 per cent. He objected to it upon the ground that, it being for educational purposes, it was right that 4 per cent. should be paid, and the Senator from Texas (Mr. MAXEY), in debating that point, made use of this language:

I am willing to have this rate of interest 4 per cent., and I would say even more than that, if need be, because—

What? Because the United States ought to pay more interest for money than it could borrow at; that the 4 per cent. was justly due; that the rate fixed was too small as compared with the market? No, but—because it is money wisely and well distributed, for the grandest of all purposes, the education of the people.

Now, I submit it to the honorable Senator from Texas if money could be borrowed at 3 per cent. readily in the market, if that was all anybody asked, and if Congress gave 1 per cent. more out of the general tax funds of the country, if it was not making that 1 per cent. a donation to educational purposes out of the general funds of the United States raised by taxation? This was December 16, 1880.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator if the United States had ever borrowed money at 3 per cent. at that time? If so, I do not remember it.

Mr. GEORGE. The reason the Senator gave for not reducing the interest was not that we could not borrow at that rate. It was even said by some that it could be borrowed at less. Mr. Hill, of Georgia, conceded, if I remember right, that it could be borrowed at less, but said we ought to pay more; and when the Senator from Texas came to advocate the 4 per cent. instead of 3, he did not say then, "We can not get money for less than 4 per cent.," but he said "no." I will read his very words:

I am willing to have this rate of interest 4 per cent., and I would say even more than that—

Five per cent. or 6 per cent.

Mr. MAXEY. We were paying 4 and 5 per cent. for money then.

Mr. GEORGE. But the Senator did not give that reason for it. The Senator gave as a reason for wishing to raise the rate that it was a donation for the grandest of all causes, the education of the people. And now I ask the Senator from Texas or any other strict constructionist in the Senate, if you can pay on a fund which belongs to the United States (because nobody denied that the money belonged to the United States) an interest greater than the United States can borrow money for in the markets, for the reason not that you can not get the money for less, but that the paying of the excessive rate is for the grandest of all purposes, the education of the people—I would ask if that is not a clear donation to the extent of this excess out of the Treasury of money raised by taxation for the purposes of education? There can be no negative answer to this.

But, Mr. President, the Senator did not allow his opinion on that subject to rest upon that short quotation from his speech which I have read. He treated, as I do, the fund arising from the proceeds of the public lands and from patent fees as actually a part of the common treasure of the country, and as much subject to and no more subject to the appropriation of Congress than money raised in any other way. Let us see what the Senator said upon that point:

Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor I concurred with that committee in reporting this bill, and I will say that if I had believed that there was one word in the bill which would interfere with the reserved rights of the States, I should never have agreed to its report. I do not believe that; but I do believe that where the United States of its own volition grants to the States a certain portion of—

What? Proceeds of the sales of the public lands? Proceeds of any money in the Treasury arising otherwise than by taxation? No.

Grants to the States a certain portion of the public treasure, in trust for the use of common schools, &c.

He speaks here of this fund in the Treasury as we who support this bill do as a part of the common public treasure of the country.

Now let us see what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] said on this subject. During the progress of the bill the Senator from Alabama, in carrying out the straight, strict-construction, State-rights theory of the Government in preserving the rights of the States with that sleepless vigilance which he has stated in a speech he made here a few days ago he always guards the interests of the people, saw proper, in order to carry out that theory of the Government, to introduce the following amendment to the Burnside or Morrill bill:

And said last-mentioned act of Congress—

Which was the act making grants of land to the States for agricultural colleges, passed in 1862—

And the said last-mentioned act of Congress—

Mr. MORGAN. That is not the same act the Senator has been reading from.

Mr. GEORGE. No, the agricultural college act was passed in 1862. But you were amending this act; you introduced the amendment to the bill reported by the Committee on Education and Labor and on which I have been commenting, and that amendment amends the agricultural-college act. I hope you understand it now. This was the amendment:

And said last-mentioned act of Congress is hereby amended so as to—

What? Authorize? Legalize? No.

So as to require each State and Territory to establish in said colleges schools for the instruction of females in such branches of technical education as are suitable to their sex.

The Senator from Alabama and all the other Senators on this side of the Chamber who oppose this bill object because it is made a condition of this grant that the ordinary branches always and everywhere taught in common schools shall be taught, though leaving it at the option of the State to accept or reject, yet here the Senator upon a grant already perfected and vested in the State years and years ago introduces an amendment requiring the States to teach certain things in their colleges.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. We have been discussing this question about the difference between the power to appropriate money raised by taxation for public education in the States and the power to apply a trust-fund realized by the Congress of the United States by the sale of lands granted to it by the States in a way that, I suppose, lawyers who discuss a question of constitutional law or of trust would understand. Now I admonish the Senator from Mississippi that he stands before the legal profession of the United States as one of the ex-judges of the supreme court of the State of Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. I beg the Senator's pardon; my attention was diverted.

Mr. MORGAN. I was admonishing the Senator from Mississippi that he stands before the legal profession of the United States as one of the ex-judges of the Supreme Court of that great State. The Senator, however, for purposes of his own, undertakes to avoid a judgment that the bar of the United States is obliged to pronounce against him of insincerity in the methods of his argument in order to try to hoodwink the people. The Senator knows as well as I do that the bill establishing the agricultural colleges was founded entirely upon the execution of a trust by the Congress of the United States, which the States themselves by their various acts of legislation had imposed as a duty upon Congress in the grant of the land. My opposition to this bill is that it does not resort to a fund of that kind derived from the States, but it resorts only to the power of taxing the people of the United States in the future to gain money for the purpose of educating the children of the people in the different States. I do not know that I can make that distinction palpable and clear to the people at all; I think I can to millions and millions of them; but the bar of the United States will never for a moment be deceived in respect of the fact that the Senator from Mississippi is arguing upon a proposition which I was debating at the time which had sole reference to the execution of a trust by Congress in the administration of a trust estate conferred upon it by concessions from the States themselves, and that I had no reference in the world to the taxing power of Congress either to promote the general welfare or anything else. With that explanation the Senator can go on; I dismiss the subject from my attention.

Mr. GEORGE. A man who talks as much as the Senator from Alabama talks ought to have a very good memory. It just so happens that in the speech he made on that bill and on the amendment he utterly ignored the distinction which he now makes. If I understood his explanation just now he advocated the bill entertaining the opinion that Congress in the execution of a trust could give the proceeds of the public lands to the States for schools. I will show before I get through in the same speech that the Senator made upon the amendment which he offered, and which I have read to the Senate, and which was objected to by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] because it was unconstitutional, that the Senator took no distinction between the power of Congress to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands and the other treasure of the United States.

But before I get to that I wanted to say something about the objections raised against this bill by the Senator from Alabama in the speech which he made.

Mr. MAXEY. As the Senator from Mississippi has referred to what I said about public treasure, I desire him to state that in the same speech I distinctly said that the public treasure referred to was the proceeds of the public domain. It was in the same speech and applied to that. That is what I meant by the expression "public treasure."

Mr. GEORGE. It only shows that at that time these gentlemen were not making the distinction between the proceeds of public lands and other moneys in the Treasury.

Mr. MORGAN. For the reason, if the Senator will allow me, that the question was not up.

Mr. GEORGE. If I may be allowed to proceed a little while I will get out of this diversion occasioned by the Senator from Texas, and show that in the same speech the Senator from Alabama made use of similar language in support of his amendment. It was objected to that amendment that there was not money enough to carry it out as well as that it was unconstitutional; and the Senator from Alabama said:

> It is very true that under ordinary circumstances the establishment and endowment of schools of technology requires a good deal of money, requires quite a variety of professors and instructors and tutors in various branches of industry which our people are following in the land, and it is equally true that the amount of money which is to be raised under this bill is comparatively a small one.

That objection was made that there was not money enough. Now how does the Senator answer that?

> Some Senators have expressed the hope and the confidence that this fund will hereafter be added to. I join very heartily in that hope and in that confidence, and that not only this fund will be increased by private contributions, but that hereafter we shall find other means arising from the general Treasury of the United States for the purpose of aiding in this very important movement, I think one of the most important movements which have ever addressed themselves to the civilization of the people of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I ask him in all candor to state whether in that remark I committed myself to the proposition that taxation was to be resorted to for that purpose? Other means from the general Treasury of the United States might result from confiscations, from forfeitures and fines; there are a thousand sources of revenue—we have the Alaska seal and fur fisheries, the amount of money that is raised by seigniorage upon the coinage of silver dollars—which are not taxed out of the people at all, which do not resort to the the taxing power, which become property in the Treasury of the United States, and which the Congress of the United States has a right to dispose of as it sees proper. My distinction has been all the time between the exercise of the taxing power and the right of Congress to appropriate public property for purposes of this kind.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator has a right to make his own explanation.

Mr. MORGAN. I have done so. That is the truth about it.

Mr. GEORGE. I have no doubt of that.

The Senator from Alabama said:

> I join very heartily in that hope and in that confidence, and that not only this fund will be increased by private contributions, but that hereafter we shall find other means arising from the general Treasury of the United States for the purpose of aiding in this very important movement.

If the Senator had reference to the Alaska seal fisheries, to the seigniorage on the coinage of silver dollars, and the various other subjects to which he has alluded, it was due I think to the intelligence of the country for the Senator to have so stated it. I stand upon his language as it is in the RECORD—"the general Treasury of the United States." If that does not include all the funds in the Treasury of the United States I am unable to understand the English language.

But, Mr. President, the Senator by his interruption diverted me from the point I was on when I read his amendment. It has been objected, it was objected this morning by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], it has been objected in debate all the way through, that this is compulsory upon the States. It was objected by the Senator from Alabama, and all the others, as I understood their remarks; it was objected by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], all concurring in the general statement that if we gave upon condition it was in effect an invasion of the authority of the State and in effect compulsory. That is the objection they make to this bill, that it is an invasion of the authority of the States.

I read from the Senator from Alabama upon that subject, and I want to read a little further upon it. I have read his amendment. It was objected to by the Senator from Massachusetts that it was unconstitutional; that you could not require a State which had already accepted a grant made by the Government to do with it otherwise than was expressed in the grant. We will see what the Senator said upon that subject. After making an elaborate argument for the purpose of showing the necessity of this kind of education and presenting some very valuable statistics, the Senator concludes:

> The facts stated in the concluding paragraphs of the paper I have presented, that the number of persons who attended upon these lectures and these instructions increased from two hundred so that within the period of less than three months they had gone up to six thousand five hundred and sixty, it seems to me do not furnish us any reason for despairing of our success if we shall make it compulsory on the States to adopt a system of this kind.

So there is the amendment of the Senator, and there is his construction upon it; and yet when in this bill grants of money are simply made upon a condition that the State must comply with in order to get it, but is left full liberty to reject, we are charged, and especially by the Senator from Alabama, with invading the reserved rights of the States.

It seems to me that if compulsion on the States was an objection to a measure of this sort, it was equally an objection in 1880. Certainly it is no more unconstitutional now to make an offer to aid the States and make it compulsory upon them (though that is not the effect of this bill) than it was in 1880, and yet we find ourselves upon this side of the Chamber who are advocating this measure charged with violating the reserved rights of the States because we propose to accept a gift upon condition without any compulsion at all.

I desire now to read what the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] said on that subject. Here in this bill is a gift. Congress offers it to us on the conditions named in it. There were conditions in the Burnside bill almost as strong and as many as in the bill now under consideration by the Senate. There was the condition that reports should be made, there was the condition that the funds should be fairly and impartially divided among all the children of the States, there were all the conditions substantially that are in this measure. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] objected to the bill upon the ground that those conditions were in it. What did the Senator from Texas say on that? I will read the same extract I read before and a little further—

> I do believe that where the United States of its own volition grants to the States a certain portion of the public treasure, in trust for the use of common schools, the United States have the right to know that the fund is appropriated in the mode and manner prescribed by the act of Congress; that it is a right which all trustees always have to see that a trust fund goes in the direction in which it was designed to go. So far as that is concerned I have nothing further to say.

So these Senators saw no objection to the gift being made upon a condition then.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to say something upon the alleged difference between the grants of public lands for the use of public schools and the grants for the same purpose of money raised by taxation or any other wise in the Treasury. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] and myself argued and debated that question at length some two years ago. He took the position that as to public lands Congress had an autocratic and unlimited power of disposition, unrestrained by any of the limitations in the Constitution upon the power of appropriation, and he maintained the right to donate them to education upon that ground. The Senator from Alabama seems to be dissatisfied with that ground and he places it upon another. I do not propose to go over the argument I had with the Senator from Texas except to say that I insisted on that occasion, as I insist now, that Congress has no autocratic and unlimited power over anything, that all of its powers are in trust, that all of the property that the Government has is trust property, a trust under the Constitution of the United States, that instrument expressing the nature, extent, and object of the trust. But the Senator from Alabama discards that ground and insists that there is a trust by contract in relation to the public lands which enables Congress to make a disposition of them for education, and which trust not extending to money does not enable Congress to make an appropriation of money out of the Treasury for the same purpose. He read from the grant made by the State of Georgia and from several other grants, but, as it is unnecessary to go through all of them, I will notice now the grant from the State of Georgia, which provided—

That all the lands ceded by this agreement to the United States shall, after satisfying the above-mentioned payment of $1,250,000 to the State of Georgia and the grants recognized by the preceding conditions, be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever.

The trust, sir, was simply this, that it should go into the common Treasury of the United States as a common fund for the benefit of the United States. If the Senator from Alabama were to undertake to define the money in the Treasury raised by taxation or in any other mode in which it can be raised for the Treasury he could not more properly describe it than in the words used in this grant: The grants shall "be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included." In accordance with that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands did go into the common Treasury of the United States, have been used as a public fund in paying the ordinary expenses of the Government, used in every way in which any other fund in the Treasury of the United States is used.

But the Senator says that that created a trust in favor of separate States of the Union, or, in other words, that the grant was to Congress as a trustee to hold the fund for the use and benefit of Georgia and South Carolina and of the other States then including the Union individually and separately, and not for their use and benefit as the United States. If that were true, and I deny it——

Mr. MORGAN. So do I.

Mr. GEORGE. You deny it?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood that to be your argument.

Mr. MORGAN. You did not understand me then.

Mr. GEORGE. I did understand it.

Mr. MORGAN. I say you did not understand me.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, of course the Senator from Alabama has a right to put his own construction upon his own language, but here is his language:

On the 24th of April, 1802, Georgia ceded the land included in Mississippi and Alabama, for a cash payment out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands of $1,250,000, to the United States upon certain conditions, of which the second are as follows.

Then he quotes the conditions:

There is certainly enough in each of these cessions to show that the original States, having outlying lands, gave up a beneficial interest in them to the States that had no such lands. They declared the beneficial interest to be reserved in themselves, and they all placed the United States in the attitude of their trustee, and as trustee of the new States to be formed from the ceded territory, to hold the proceeds in trust for all the States then existing or afterward to be formed as a common fund.

And in speaking of North Carolina and South Carolina he says:

On the 9th of August, 1787, South Carolina ceded her wild lands "to the United States of America, for their benefit, South Carolina inclusive," the words "their benefit" clearly meaning the separate States. A portion of this cession stretches across North Alabama.

On the 25th of February, 1790, North Carolina, after making certain reservations, ceded her western possessions, now the State of Tennessee, and then having large white settlements, "unto the United States of America for the benefit of said States, North Carolina inclusive," "said States" meaning each and all the States. In the deed was this condition among others.

So I had good ground for supposing that he meant that it was a gift for the use of the separate States. I accept his explanation, however, as he has a right to put a construction upon his own language.

Mr. MORGAN. I will restate it if the Senator from Mississippi will allow me.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand it very well. You can restate it, however.

Mr. MORGAN. The gift was a gift of lands belonging to the States to the United States of America for the benefit of each and all of the States, and it conferred upon each State the right to receive back from the Government of the United States any donation of this property or any release of it that the Government of the United States might choose to make—a power that is not conferred upon the States by any other condition or clause of the Constitution or any other circumstances. The States reserved to themselves the right to receive back in such form as Congress might choose to bestow it a portion of the lands in kind, in place, or the proceeds of them for any State purpose whatsoever. That is my position.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand, then, the position of the Senator to be this——

Mr. MORGAN. I have stated it.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand his position to be that it was to go as a common fund in the Treasury of the United States, but with the reserved right that Congress might give it to any one of the States in such proportion as Congress might see proper, and not to go to each one equally and according to its Federal ratio or right in the Treasury.

You will find in some of these grants that it is expressly stated that the lands shall go in that way. I do not believe that I can lay my hand upon it now; but however that may be, put it upon the language used in the grant of Georgia, and they are all substantially alike—shall be "considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever." How could that be disposed of as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States except by appropriating it out of the Treasury for use in the ordinary operations of the Government? The United States were a corporation; they owned property; they had taxation; they had expenses; and how, I ask, could this fund be used otherwise, if it was a common fund, than for the common benefit? It is an assumption not warranted by the language of the grant or by the practice of the Government under it.

But if the Senator from Alabama is right, which I deny that he is, in reference to the grant from Georgia and the other States, what becomes of his doctrine of trust when it is applied to that immense territory which we acquired from France in Louisiana, from Spain in Florida, and from Mexico? I read from the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States:

The First Consul of the French Republic, desiring to give to the United States a strong proof of his friendship, doth hereby cede to the said United States in the name of the French Republic, forever and in full sovereignty, the said territory, with all its rights and appurtenances, as fully and in the same manner as they have been acquired by the French Republic in virtue of the above-mentioned treaty, concluded with his Catholic majesty.

There is no trust there. There is a simple grant to the United States as a Government; no trust, no nothing except a simple grant to the United States. When you go to the treaty made with Mexico there is even no grant at all; there is just a line run between the United States and Mexico up the Rio Grande, up the Rio Gila, and then to the Pacific Ocean, and it is said there that the lands on the north side or the east side of that line remain to the United States. There is no trust there. If that is a trust, it is impossible to make a grant to the United States which will not be impressed with a trust that it may divide it out among the States as it sees proper. There is very little land, there was in 1880 very little land, belonging to the Government of the United States which did not come under either the Mexican or the French treaty. From lands thus acquired from France and Mexico nine-tenths of the proceeds of public lands mentioned in the Burnside bill must necessarily come. So I take it it can not be made out that there is any trust which would authorize Congress to make any disposition of this property that it would not be authorized to make of any other property belonging to the United States.

I spoke in the beginning of my remarks yesterday of the interest which the colored people of Mississippi had in this bill. I desire now to say that the white people of Mississippi have also an interest, and a deep interest in it. I shall not urge the arguments which I think might properly be urged in their behalf in this matter, because I prefer to read to the Senate a better argument made in their behalf by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY]. The Senator from Texas, in discussing the necessity for the passage of the Burnside bill, said:

Whether we will or not, the colored people are to-day citizens. If it be true, and it is true, that the perpetuity of free government depends upon the virtue and intelligence of the people, then common sense will tell any man that the more enlightened, the more virtuous you make those who enter into the body-politic the more certain you are of the perpetuation of free institutions. These colored people have become by the Constitution and the laws of our country a part and parcel of the body-politic. They were but a few years ago slaves. They are mainly in the portion of the country where I live. It is the interest of the Southern people that this colored population should be educated. They are among us; they are entitled to vote; they are entitled to hold office; they are entitled to sit upon juries; they are entitled to be appointed executors, administrators, and guardians; they are entitled to any official political position that a white man is entitled to; and hence it is of the utmost importance to us and to the perpetuity of our institutions that these people should become educated. Coming out of the war as they did without property, what they now own they have had to acquire by their own exertions. They are necessarily poor. Their children have to be educated. In the State in which I live by the terms of the constitution—and similar provisions are in the constitutions of all the Southern States—they are entitled to the same common-school education that the white child is entitled to.

He proceeded further, after some interruption:

Mr. President, as I stated, these people came out of the war without property, their children under the constitutions of the Southern States are entitled, like the white children, to be educated. The burden of educating those children falls upon the whites. The white men of the South came out of the war deprived of their property. We were impoverished by the war, and what little of property was left there was left in the hands of the white people, and the burden of educating both white and black has devolved upon the white people in the Southern section of the country.

I read that because it expresses my view better than I can express it myself.

Mr. MAXEY. I beg to say, if the Senator will permit me, that I indorse every word of that, and did the other day.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not reading it for the purpose of making the Senator appear inconsistent, but to support the passage of the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. I said on that bill that I was in favor of appropriating the proceeds of the public domain for purposes of education, and I stated the other day that I would do the same thing. I have not changed in regard to the matter.

Mr. GEORGE. There is another sentence which I will read, because it adds force to what the Senator had said and because also it contains some expressions which were singularly inconsistent, I thought, with the conduct of the Senator from Texas a few days ago when it was charged in debate that it was dishonest for any State to receive money under this bill because of the unequal distribution of it, seeing that the distribution under the Burnside bill of the fund for ten years was exactly on the same basis.

Mr. MAXEY. Have I charged dishonesty against anybody?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not charge dishonesty against anybody about anything here.

Mr. GEORGE. The distribution under the Burnside bill for the first ten years was exactly the same as the distribution under this bill; that is, according to the illiteracy of the population of ten years of age and upward. That bill made this distribution for ten years and this bill only makes a distribution for eight years. I say when it was charged in debate that for a State to receive a distribution under the provisions of this bill was dishonest the Senator from Texas got up and to my surprise stated that Texas was not for the bill. Premising that much, I will read the last sentence of the paragraph from which I have been reading:

These people—

That is, the colored people—were made citizens by the act of this Federal Government, and it is a matter of common justice, it is a matter of common honesty and fair dealing, in my judgment, for the Federal Government to aid in their education, to aid the States which are now educating them.

Mr. MAXEY. I said that the other day. Now read that. [Indicating.]

Mr. GEORGE. I will do so. My attention is called to another portion of the Senator's speech which I shall read with great pleasure.

Mr. MAXEY. In what the Senator has read he has not stated and left entirely unexplained that I used the phrase "common treasure." What I now ask the Senator from Mississippi to read shows precisely what I meant by "common treasure."

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Texas says in another part of his speech:

If it be true that out of the common treasure the vacant public domain belonging to the United States could be given to a particular State or Territory because it happened to lie within the limits of that State or Territory, I ask if that principle does not authorize Congress to take the proceeds of this vacant public domain and distribute them among all the States which constitute the Union for which we are the trustees? Sir, the constitutional argument falls—falls upon principle as well as upon precedent.

The only point I make is that the Senator, as all of us do who advocate this bill, speaks of all the funds in the public Treasury without distinction as public treasure. Of course when the Senator made his argument at the close of his speech he confined it to the bill under consideration to the public lands.

Now, Mr. President, I have said all I intend to say upon this subject. I have made, I confess, a very desultory and unsatisfactory argument this morning. I have not felt well, but I felt it to be my duty to say what I have said in favor of a measure so much demanded by the people of my State. I have looked on this measure all along, I wish to repeat, as a generous offering made by the people of the Northern States to the people of the Southern States to aid them in working out the greatest of all problems with which a free people have ever been tasked. I shall not try to depict the trouble that we are in. It is sufficient to say that there is a large mass of uneducated people in the Southern States belonging to a class whose ancestors for hundreds of years have been unused and unaccustomed to self-government. I believe myself—I might as well say it here—that the capacity of the Anglo-Saxon race for self-government is in a large degree an inherited aptitude; I have no doubt about that. Those people are among us; they are citizens under the Constitution and laws of our country; they have a right to participate in the Government; the duty is imposed on them by law to participate in the Government; they are unfit, ignorant as they are, to engage in that participation. If the Northern people desire to help us in this great trouble I am willing to accept it. I understand this bill to have been offered to us by the North. I understand from a statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire, who has with such courage, ability, and patriotic zeal and persistent energy pressed the bill under all circumstances, that this bill was perfected by a Republican caucus. I accept it then, also, as an offer from that caucus. If the Republicans of the Senate desire to withdraw that offer, it is in their power to do so. If they will hold another caucus, if they are dissatisfied with the offering which they have made and withdraw the offer, that ends the measure. The Southern men who favor it can not pass it; it must fall for the want of support of those who made the offer.

I believe, sir, I have said all I desire to say on this subject.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I desire at some stage of the debate on this bill to submit some brief remarks. I presented and had printed some amendments which I propose to offer at the appropriate time. I had intended to submit what I desired to say upon the merits of the bill at the time of offering the amendments, but we have drifted away from the question before the Senate, which is the motion to adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and have for several days been discussing the merits of the bill, and it appears as if that course will be continued until the Senate is ready to vote upon the several pending and proposed amendments and is impatient of further discussion. I shall therefore embrace this opportunity to say what I desire to say upon the merits of the bill as well as upon the amendments which I propose to offer.

The first amendment intended to be proposed by me is to add to section 1 the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That no money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any State until three-fourths of all the States have so accepted the provisions of this act.

The bill now contains, at the close of the first section, the following provision:

Provided, That no money shall be paid to a State, or any officer thereof, until the Legislature of the State shall, by bill or resolution, accept the provisions of this act; and such acceptance shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill as it came from the Senate committee, and the bill which passed the Senate at the last Congress, did not contain this provision. I believe it is a meritorious one and should be retained in the bill, but I think its presence in the bill necessitates the further amendment which I propose. I do not intend to discuss it at length. I propose to state to the Senate the reasons why I think it necessary and the object intended to be accomplished by it, and shall then submit it to the judgment of the Senate.

I start with this affirmative proposition, that no money shall be paid to any State until its Legislature has by act or resolution accepted the provisions of this act, from which it is reasonable to infer that it is the intention that whenever a State has accepted the provisions of this act it shall receive its allotment under it.

It is well known that there are several of the States whose legislative assemblies meet but once in two years. It may therefore happen that nearly two years will elapse after the bill shall become a law before some of the States will have an opportunity to determine in the manner proposed in the bill whether they will accept its provisions or not. In the mean time one or more States may have accepted the provisions of the bill, and the question will then arise, what course is the Secretary of the Interior to adopt in the execution of this measure? Is he to pay to those States which have accepted the provisions of the bill the proportion which they would receive if all the States had accepted its provisions, or is he to pay to the one or more States which have accepted its provisions during the first year the entire appropriation for that year?

If he is to pay only the allotment which is due to the States which accept the provisions of the bill, what is to become of the balance of the appropriation for that year? Will it lapse into the Treasury and be lost to those States which have had no opportunity to accept the provisions of the bill, whose Legislatures have not met, or will such States, after they have accepted its provisions, receive their allotments for the first year in addition to their proportions for the second year, or will they receive their allotments for the first year, and then the next year receive their proportion for the second year, and so on, the receipt by such States of their allotments for each year being postponed from year to year from the fact that they did not accept the provisions of the bill during the first year? Is it the intention of the Senate that we shall enter upon this scheme of Federal aid to education in a fragmentary manner and before a sufficient number of States have accepted the provisions of the bill to insure that the scheme can be carried out and will be successful?

These suggestions, it appears to me, show the necessity for some rule fixing the time when this proposed law shall go into effect and when the Secretary of the Interior, under the authority conferred upon him, shall proceed to execute it. It would be unjust to the Secretary of the Interior, or any other executive officer of the Government, to leave the execution of the law to him under the provisions of the bill as it now stands; and if any rule is necessary, if we are to prescribe the time when the money shall be apportioned and paid to the States, what shall be the rule? Shall we say, and I understand that to be the position of the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, that when a single State has accepted the provisions of this bill it shall receive its proportion of the money, that we will commence the expenditure of this money and put the law in operation when a single State has accepted its provisions, or when half a dozen States have accepted its provisions, or when a majority of the Southern States have accepted its provisions, or when a majority of all the States, or when three-fourths of all the States have accepted its provisions, as provided in the amendment proposed by me?

The second amendment which I propose to offer when the proper time arrives is to add to section 2 the following:

Until and including the year 1890, and afterward according to the census of 1890.

So as to provide that the distribution of the funds appropriated under the provisions of this bill shall be made in accordance with the census returns of 1880 until a new census is taken, and then the distribution shall be made according to the returns of the new census.

When the census of 1890 is taken it may be disclosed that the proportion of illiterates between the North and South and between the several States of the South has changed; and after we have another census to serve as a basis upon which to make the apportionment it certainly ought to be made according to the latest census returns.

The latter clause of the second amendment is as follows:

Provided, That the District of Alaska shall be considered a Territory within the meaning of this act; and the money apportioned to said District shall be expended annually, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in the manner provided for the expenditure of other appropriations for educational purposes in said District.

This clause is necessary if Alaska is to be included within the provisions of the bill and to receive her proportion of the benefits of it. The late Secretary of the Interior, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], says if Alaska is not included it ought to be. It is necessary to provide, I think, by this amendment that it shall be included, because, as I said on a former occasion, the Committee on Territories was careful to call the Territory of Alaska a district in framing a Territorial government for it. It is known in the statutes creating the Territorial government as the District of Alaska, but if it is already included, the amendment which I propose will do no harm. A further provision is necessary in regard to the distribution of the money to be appropriated to Alaska, because there are no school laws and no general system of education there. Therefore, the money should be disbursed by the Secretary of the Interior, under whose direction our annual appropriations for educational purposes in that Territory are applied.

As I shall proceed to show shortly, I think it will be necessary soon to establish some system of education in Alaska, to regulate by law the expenditure of appropriations for educational purposes there, and therefore this amendment provides that the money which the Territory would receive under the bill shall be expended as other and future appropriations for the purpose of education in the Territory are expended, making a certain rule upon that subject.

While upon the question of education in Alaska I desire to say a few words in regard to the necessity of educating the native youth of that Territory and of providing some system of education there. During the recess of Congress last year I visited Alaska, partly for purposes of pleasure and recreation and partly for the purpose of ascertaining the resources of the Territory and the adaptation of the new government that was provided by the last Congress for it to meet the needs of its people. While there I visited two of the industrial schools of the Territory, one located at Sitka and the other at Wrangel. While I was prepared to some extent by my information in regard to the work of education in industrial Indian schools for what I saw, I was agreeably surprised and much gratified with the character of the educational work being done in Alaska; and I was greatly impressed with the necessity of educating the native youth of that Territory, and also with the obstacles in the way of establishing anything like a uniform system of education in the Territory.

The appropriations which were made by the last Congress for the purposes of education in Alaska were so small and disproportioned to the needs of the Territory, that it was found necessary for the Secretary of the Interior in expending the appropriation for industrial education, instead of attempting to build school-houses and establishing new schools, to apply the money to the schools already in existence there, which had been established and supported by private contributions under the supervision of the Board of Missions of the Presbyterian Church; which he did by making contracts with some of those schools to take an additional number of pupils at a fixed rate per pupil. Although that was the only thing which it was practicable to do with the appropriation on account of the character of the country and the absence of all laws providing for a school system and the inadequacy of the appropriation, there is already complaint that the Government appropriations are being expended for the support of sectarian schools. I, therefore, think that the time will come before long when the Government will find it necessary to appropriate sufficient sums for education in Alaska, and to bring forward some system of general education for the Territory and regulate the expenditure of appropriations for educational purposes there by law.

The obstacles in the way of providing a system of education for Alaska arise from the vast extent of that Territory, being from north to south 1,200 miles in extent, and from the eastern boundary to the most western of the Aleutian Islands 2,200 miles, and embracing an area of 480,000 square miles, and from the fact that there are no roads in the Territory and no means of inland transportation or travel, and will not be for generations. All the facilities for travel and transportation are by Indian canoes and Government vessels, except about once a month when the ocean steamer from Portland arrives, and then the steamer only touches at a few of the principal points, and from the fact also that the native population is scattered all along the coast, 2,500 miles in extent, and along the principal rivers, and even upon the headwaters of streams in the interior living in small villages and communities.

There are in Alaska somewhere from 30,000 to 35,000 natives. Of these about 10,000 are children of school age. There are in Southern Alaska, which consists of a narrow strip bounding British Columbia on the west, and the Alexandrian Archipelago, consisting of some ten thousand islands, about 7,000 natives, among whom there are about 2,500 children of school age; and about 550 of those are now enjoying school privileges in schools maintained at the expense of the Government or in private schools. In Northern Alaska, which contains 23,000 or more native population, so far as I am informed there are but two schools, maintained by the Alaska Fur Trading Company upon the islands of Saint Paul and Saint George.

All of those Indians are self-supporting. They live by fishing and hunting, the principal industries of the country. They never can be placed upon reservations; they never can be put under Government surveillance; they never need be a tax upon the Government except for education; and from the character of the country, the fact that there are no roads, and that there are no means of transportation in the interior of the country, it never will be possible for the United States to keep them under control by military forces. They now greatly outnumber the whites in the Territory, and they will do so probably for a generation. It therefore becomes an imperative necessity to educate and civilize them, and every dollar which is expended in their education will save the Government the expenditure of $10 in some other manner if they are not educated.

I met at Wrangel a very intelligent gentleman who has spent many years in the work of education in Alaska, and who has given the subject a great deal of study. I availed myself of the opportunity to learn what I could in regard to the educational wants of the Territory and as to the manner in which the Government schools should be conducted and the Government appropriations could be most profitably expended. I left with him certain points upon which I desired information and upon which I requested him to write to me after my return. He wrote me a letter which contains a great deal of valuable information and many valuable suggestions, stated concisely and well arranged. Although the letter was not intended for publication, I will submit it as a part of my remarks and have it appear in the RECORD. I call the attention of the chairmen of the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations to the letter, and I hope they will read it. It is as follows:

FORT WRANGEL, ALASKA, October 15, 1885.

SIR: In answer to your questions on the subject of education in Alaska, I would respectfully submit the following as the views of one who has been actively engaged in the work of education and civilization in the Territory for the last seven years. What I say must be understood as applying specially to Southeastern Alaska, or the Alexandrian Archipelago, the only portion of the Territory with which I am familiar.

I. The number of natives in Alaska in computed at 30,000, and of these more than half are called Indians, although their appearance, customs, mode of life, dispositions, and degree of advancement in mechanical arts prove them to be of different race from the Indians of the plains, and point to a comparatively recent Asiatic origin. The term Indian, applied to our natives here, is misleading.

The natives of this archipelago number about 7,000.

II. I am unable to give the number of children of school age, but would compute it at about two thousand five hundred.

III. There are at present in operation nine schools in the archipelago, classified as follows:

(a) Mission day schools, three, namely: One at Chilcoot Harbor, in the extreme north of the archipelago, taught by Miss Bessie Mathews. The second is at Hoonah, on Cross Sound, and is taught by Rev. J. W. McFarland and his wife. The third is at Longass, in the extreme south of the archipelago, taught by two half-breeds trained at Fort Wrangel, Mr. Louis Paul and wife.

The teachers of these schools are all paid directly by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, and are accountable only to it.

(b) Government day schools, four:

1. At Sitka, Miss Powell, teacher.
2. At Juneau, Miss Murphy, teacher.
3. At Fort Wrangel, Miss McAvoy, teacher.
4. At Jackson, Miss Gould, teacher.

These schools are supported entirely by the Government, and are under the supervision of Rev. Sheldon Jackson, D. D., agent of education. They were formerly mission schools, but have been handed over to the Government.

(c) Boarding-schools, two:

1. The Sitka training-school, in charge of Professor A. J. Davis, with eight assistants. This school is supported jointly by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions and the Government.

2. The Tlinkit training academy, at Fort Wrangel, in charge of Mrs. S. H. Young and three assistants. This institution is supported entirely by private contributions and is under no society or board.

IV. The number of pupils attending these schools I would estimate at five hundred and fifty.

V. The education desirable for these natives is such as will fit them for citizenship. They are not "treaty Indians." They do not live on reservations. They stand on the same footing in regard to the owning of property and amenity to law as the whites. They need such an education as will enable them to compete successfully with the whites in arts and trades and become something better than mere "hewers of wood and drawers of water."

VI. The plan of education which the Government should adopt is indicated by the foregoing. Let common day schools be established in every considerable settlement, at least one for each native tribe and one or more in every town where there are whites. Let competent teachers be sent to them, school-houses built, and every effort be made to teach the children to talk and read in English.

Let no books be printed in the Tlinkit language, and no work of translation be done except in the interest of philological science. The language of a barbarous people embodies and preserves its customs, superstitions, and vices. The language of civilization, substituted for this, will teach all the arts, customs, and habits of thought of the superior race. The sooner the Tlinkit becomes a dead language the better for this people. Let these schools be open and free to whites, Russians, half-breeds, and Indians, without distinction.

But industrial education is by far the shortest road to Caucasian civilization. The two training-schools already established are sufficient for the wants of Southeastern Alaska, if properly equipped and managed. I would make the following suggestions:

Let the Government assume the entire control and support of the Sitka school, purchasing the buildings, if necessary, from the board of missions, that there be no conflict of interests or authority. Let the present principal and teachers be retained if found competent, and others procured if necessary. Let shops, under the supervision of trained workmen, be established, and this part of the school be emphasized. Let the Yakutat, Chilkhat, Hoonah, Auk, Hoochenov, and Sitka tribes, occupying the northwestern half of the archipelago, be invited to send their most promising boys and girls to this school, that they may be fitted to engage in the rapidly developing industries of the archipelago and to assume the duties of enlightened citizenship.

Let the private training-school at Fort Wrangel be aided to the same extent and in a similar way. Let it be enrolled as a Government training-school to receive its share of the appropriations for industrial schools. Let the present management be retained, if found competent; let suitable buildings be erected at Wrangel, or on the farm belonging to the institution; let the shoe, cabinet and carpenter shops, and printing office, already equipped with apparatus and tools, be provided with skilled instructors, other assistants be procured, and the school enabled to realize the idea of its founder more successfully than is now possible. Let the Tacoo, Stickine, Kake, Kooyou, Hanega, Tongass, and Hydah tribes occupying the southeastern half of the archipelago be invited to send their children to this school to be educated at Government expense, the boys in the trades of use in the Territory, the girls in intelligent house-keeping, and all in the rudiments of an English education.

VII. There are obvious objections to expending the Government appropriations on sectarian schools. The following suggest themselves:

1. It tends to excite jealousy between different denominations.

2. It divorces from the schools the sympathy and aid of those interested in religious schools on the one hand, and on the other of those who do not belong to any denomination of professing Christians.

3. It is opposed to the principle of entire religious freedom and the complete separation of church and state.

But frequently the cry is raised that Government appropriations are used to aid sectarian schools when such is not the case. The plan I have outlined could not possibly be open to that objection. But the Presbyterian Church has until this year had the only schools in the archipelago since the purchase of Alaska, with one or two small exceptions. It has expended thousands of dollars upon these schools, and has erected buildings, employed teachers, and made successful efforts to enlighten the people. Its schools have been free to all classes. It now has a corps of competent teachers on the ground, brought from the Eastern States at its expense. To summarily dismiss these teachers would be unjust to them and to the church and injurious to the schools.

Let these teachers be retained so far as they are found upon examination to be competent; but let the Government introduce its own system of text-books, records, and reports, and the schools be brought up strictly to the requirements of the civil service. And hereafter let the superintending agent recommend for appointment the teachers to be employed, without following any denominational line, solely on the ground of their qualification as teachers.

VIII. The portion of Alaska southeast of Mount Saint Elias is so different in climate, resources, inhabitants, and general conditions from the rest of the Territory, and so isolated from it, that it ought to constitute an educational district by itself, with its own system and own superintendent.

IX. The amount of money that can be economically and profitably expended in Southeast Alaska I would estimate for the present year at $20,000 for the day schools and $15,000 for each of the training-schools. Or, in regard to the training-schools, let a sum sufficient to supply them with suitable buildings, shops, and equipments be set aside for this purpose, and then let the appropriation for the running expenses of each school be proportioned to the number of pupils.

X. As the various towns and tribes in the archipelago are distant from each other and communication can be had only by water, and in most cases only by private boats or canoes, the Government should procure two small steam-launches or yachts, to be placed at Sitka and Wrangel respectively, under the control of the principals of the training-schools at these places. These boats should be used exclusively for the benefit of the schools, to be a means of communication between them, to convey supplies, to carry the superintendent of education on his visits to the day schools, and to procure pupils for the training-schools. The cost of these vessels would be small, and they are essential to the full success of the schools.

XI. In conclusion, allow me to call your attention more particularly to the condition and needs of the Tlinkit training academy at Fort Wrangel, in charge of Mrs. Young. It is the only educational institution in the archipelago which has received no aid from either the Government or the board of missions, and yet it is more truly an industrial school and has more to show for its work in the advancement of its pupils toward self-supporting citizenship than any other school in Alaska. It has from its origin, three years ago, been entirely supported by private contributions, obtained in response to the letters and public addresses of its founder. rom the first the effort was made to work as rapidly as possible toward self-support. A large farm—the only piece of land worthy of the name in this region, an alluvial meadow—was purchased, and the services of an experienced farmer secured. Machines and tools sufficient to fully equip carpenter, cabinet, and shoe shops were obtained.

The Government permitted us to occupy the buildings of the garrison. The boys of the carpenter and cabinet shops repaired, altered, and furnished them. Guns and fishing apparatus were bought, and thus the supply of animal food obtained. As one item, be boys killed for the use of the school in 1884 one hundred and twenty-one deer. For fruit, the children gathered berries. The boys of the shoe shop made and mended all the shoes used in the school. The farm furnished all the potatoes and other vegetables needed. For clothing we depended upon boxes sent by friends. Thus every effort was made to economize, and the inmates were taught that the condition of their remaining in the school was that they should do all they could to help themselves and each other. The girls did all the sewing and laundry work and general house-keeping. The boys procured the fuel, besides the other supplies mentioned. Each pupil was kept in the school-room half the day, and engaged in useful and instructive labor the other half.

Mrs. Young paid three assistants—a matron for the girls, a housekeeper, and the farmer. Thirty boys and girls were taken, the most of whom still remain.

But the support is inadequate and unreliable. Some societies, under pressure of the board of missions, which is naturally desirous of drawing the benevolences of the churches into its channels, withdrew their support. The farm, on which we based our principal hope of self-support, failed to realize those hopes, because we were unable to buy the team, implements, and stock needed. Instead of expanding and enlarging the work we were compelled to retrench. Most of the larger boys were dismissed to work for themselves, and the lady assistant was released to take charge of the day school.

The Government appropriation for industrial schools was all drawn to Sitka. Last May we sent an application for the unexpended balance, backed by the civil officers of the Territory, but we were too late.

As our only desire is to benefit these promising children, let the Government take up this school, using the shops, farm, printing-press, and supplies on hand, and furnishing such buildings, assistants, and equipments as shall suffice to fully organize and make successful this interesting school. Let it become a Government school, subject to all the requirements of the Department. A portion of the appropriation for the present fiscal year should be applied for the benefit of this school, and it should receive its full share of future appropriations. The present number of pupils is twenty-five. The adjacent tribes would gladly send their children to this school were it enlarged and equipped, while they will not send to Sitka; and in many respects, notably in the matter of the farm, Wrangel has decided advantages over the other town as the seat of such an institution.

Submitted, very respectfully,

S. HALL YOUNG,
Minister in charge of Presbyterian Mission, Fort Wrangel, Alaska.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH.

I have always had doubts as to whether the provisions of this bill were sufficient to accomplish the object which I suppose is intended to be accomplished by it. It will be recollected that when the bill which passed the Senate at the last Congress was under discussion I offered an amendment proposing the appointment by the General Government of a commissioner to take in charge, to a certain extent, in the States the distribution of the fund proposed to be appropriated by that bill, and to see that it was distributed in accordance with the provisions of the bill; but I never dreamed until recently that the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor supposed that the bill was at all defective in that regard or would fail to accomplish the purposes for which it was intended. I was, therefore, much surprised a week ago last Monday, when, according to my understanding of his language at the time, and I still think it will bear that construction, he distinctly conceded that the bill would not accomplish the object which I supposed it was intended to accomplish, when he alluded to the fact that there were four millions of children of school age in the Southern States not now enrolled in schools and not now receiving educational advantages who would not be reached by the appropriations to be made under the bill and who would not be benefited by it. If the money appropriated by this bill is not intended to reach that large illiterate class what in the name of common sense is the bill worth and who will it reach? Sir, I have not so understood this measure and have supposed that the intention of the framers of the bill was that this money should reach that very class.

Mr. BLAIR rose.

Mr. DOLPH. I will yield.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator certainly is under a misapprehension as to my meaning or the construction of what I said. I have stated all along that, instead of being an enormous contribution, according to the necessity the amount we are giving is not by any means an adequate remedy to the entire evil or to anything like the extent that school privileges are already provided for the children of the North. I say it will help and help very much, but it is not sufficient to accomplish the entire purpose, to give the South educational facilities equal to ours, but it will help in that direction.

Mr. DOLPH. The language of the Senator was read by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] the other day. I did not intend to read it again. I think it has been in part explained away by the Senator from New Hampshire, but he stated the following:

It has been stated in the speech of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] this afternoon that there are about four million children in the Southern States who are not enrolled at all, who are not attending school at all, and we by this bill make no provision for this vast uncultivated class who are outside the present operations of the common-school system, so that the appropriation is a trivial appropriation in comparison with the actual necessity of the country, and yet it is talked of as a mammoth appropriation, as a great bribe to those who may receive benefit from it.

I do not care to put any construction upon that.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will excuse me. In those same remarks and at half a dozen other times I have said that if we should apply the same amount that we give to the existing schools without any extension of the enrollment it would only then make the existing schools about six months in length instead of three, as they now are; but of course the money will not be so applied. It will be applied to the extension of schools where there are none now, to some degree, and also to an increase in the length of the schools already existing.

Mr. DOLPH. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire, that if we are to enter upon this work at all, the amount proposed in this bill to be appropriated is not only not too large, but it is inadequate to the work; but that was not the point I was addressing myself to. The point I was directing the attention of the Senate to was that I thought it had been stated by the Senator from New Hampshire that the money to be appropriated by this bill would not reach the large class of children in the South who are not now enrolled in schools. As I said, I have not so understood the provisions of this bill. In the first section, after providing that $77,000,000 shall be appropriated, and giving the amount to be appropriated each year, the bill continues:

Which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States.

And in the third section it is provided that—

No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that shall not have provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age, without distinction of race or color, either in the raising or distributing of school revenues or in the school facilities afforded.

And in the tenth section it is provided:

That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools, not sectarian in character, in the school districts of the several States and Territories.

I had been led to believe from these provisions that it was the intention of this bill that before the States receive the benefit of it, the money to be apportioned to them under it, they should provide a system of free schools which should reach every portion of their territory and give every child of school age, white or black, within their borders an opportunity to acquire an education; but when I turn to the eleventh section of the bill, which provides what reports shall be made of the expenditure of the money received by the States and what shall be done in case there is a failure to observe the provisions of the bill, and read it, I conclude that it is susceptible of a construction which will defeat the intention of its framers, that its provisions are inadequate to secure the application of the money to the education of the illiterate class. I find in the eleventh section that the governor of each State is required to report to the Secretary of the Interior among other things—

The number of public, common, and industrial schools, the number of teachers employed, the total number of children taught during the year, and in what branches instructed, &c.

But there is no provision in the bill, as I now remember, requiring that the governor shall report how many school districts there are in the State; that he shall report whether or not the whole State has been subdivided into school districts or other subdivisions for school purposes; that he shall report the number of children in each school district, white and black, with the number of children attending school in each district. He may under the provisions of the bill as it stands report the number of schools and the number of children, white and black, attending the schools, and no one can tell, neither the Secretary of the Interior nor any one else, from the report whether or not the money has been so distributed as to afford the means of education to all the children of school age in the State without distinction of color.

I have prepared an amendment to be inserted in section 11, line 12, after the word "also," which is as follows:

A statement of the number of school districts in such State or Territory, and whether any portion of such State or Territory has not been divided into school districts or other territorial subdivisions for school purposes, and, if so, what portion, and the reasons why the same has not been so subdivided; the number of children of school age in each district, and the relative number of white and colored children in each district.

If the report is required to contain the matters stated in this proposed amendment, then the Secretary of the Interior will be able to ascertain whether or not the territory has all been subdivided into school districts, whether or not schools have been maintained in all the school districts, whether or not the money has been impartially expended as between the white and colored children in the several school districts; and from that report he can determine whether or not the provisions of this bill have been faithfully complied with, and whether or not the State is entitled to receive the next allotment of money to be appropriated under this bill.

But, sir, when we come to the last clause of section 11, which may be said to contain the sanction of the bill, that is to say, the only part of the bill which provides any penalty, if I may use that expression without offense, for failing to comply with the provisions of the bill, I find it is provided:

And if any State or Territory shall misapply or allow to be misapplied, or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act—or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, and the other matters herein prescribed to be so reported, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made.

And now follows another provision—

I understand the misappropriation here meant to be an entire diversion of a portion of the money to some other purpose than that provided in the bill; it is provided that if that shall be done and there shall be a failure to make the report no further apportionment shall be made to the State; but when the State has replaced the money so misappropriated and has made the report, then it shall receive its apportionment. In other words, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be paid over to the State this fund. But there is no penalty prescribed for not keeping the other provisions of the act. There is no penalty prescribed if the money is used for educational purposes and a discrimination is made between white and colored children. When the governor of the State makes a report and any money which has been taken from the fund has been restored to it, the next apportionment is to be made to the State.

I propose to strike out of this clause the words "or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed," so that it will permit the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be paid to a State its apportionment under this act after any money which may have been misappropriated has been restored and after it shall have made a report; and then I propose to add a provision for a case where the State shall use these funds contrary to the provisions of the act and shall discriminate between white and black children in the application of the fund to the purposes of education; I propose to add the following:

And if any State or Territory shall have failed, except as permitted by section 8, to apply the money expended by it out of the amount apportioned to it under the provisions of this act, for any one year, to the support of common schools, free for all its children of school age, without distinction of color, and in such a way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of such State or Territory, within such State or Territory, no subsequent allotment shall be made under this act until Congress shall so determine.

I think this is a very necessary provision. My friend from New Hampshire says that the provision is not necessary, because Congress must make the appropriation in any case; but there are some able men in the Senate who believe this bill carries its own appropriation and makes a continuing appropriation; and if it does not, and it is necessary for Congress to make in appropriation bills from year to year an appropriation to carry into effect the provisions of this bill, that appropriation will be made not later than the 3d of March and probably during the last days of February at the short sessions, and in other years it will be made during the last days of June. An appropriation may be made before a report is made. As the bill now stands it would authorize a report to be made at any time, and then the Secretary of the Interior would be authorized to pay the money which had been appropriated in advance by Congress to the State. Therefore it seems to me the misappropriation of the money, the application of it to the various schools of the State so as to discriminate between the children of school age in the State contrary to the provisions of this bill, ought to prevent the State from receiving any other apportionment until Congress shall so declare.

The amount appropriated by this bill may be, as it is stated by the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, a very inadequate sum for the exigencies of the case; but, sir, when we consider that this $77,000,000 must be raised by taxation in some form from the people and upon the industries of this country, that its burdens will largely fall upon the laboring population of the country, upon men who labor for their daily bread and have children of their own to clothe and support, this sum assumes importance enough to require us to place in this bill sufficient provisions to see that it is applied in the States in accordance with the intention of the friends of the measure.

I do not intend to discuss these amendments or the bill at length, and I desire it to be distinctly understood that the amendments are not proposed out of any hostility to this measure or the people of any portion of this Union. I am in sympathy with the object sought to be accomplished by this bill, so far as I understand it, which is the education of the illiterate children of school age in the South, who it is conceded are largely composed of colored children.

I confess that I am not as clear as to the constitutionality of the measure as I was when it was under discussion at the last Congress; but if this bill can be put in such a shape as to reasonably assure me that the money to be appropriated under its provisions will be used in the manner intended by the friends of the bill and will promote the object sought to be attained, the education of the colored children of the South, and not otherwise, I stand ready to resolve whatever doubts I have as to the constitutionality of the measure in favor of it. But, sir, as the money to be appropriated under this bill is to go largely to the Southern States, as it is admitted that the necessity which calls for Federal aid exists in the Southern States alone, as the illiteracy of the colored people of the South is the excuse for making this large appropriation from the Federal Treasury, I would much prefer to support a bill which made appropriations to the Southern States only.

I agree with the Senators from Kansas, and with others who have taken the same view of the matter, that the people of the Northern States have not demanded this aid, that they do not need it. The money which they will receive under the provisions of this bill, in my judgment will be an injury to the common school systems of those States. It will, it is true, relieve the people of those States in some measure from the burden of taxation for school purposes, but it will teach them to rely upon the Federal Government for aid, and make them feel more keenly the burdens of taxation when that is withdrawn, and I fear it will lessen their estimate of the value and benefit of their common school system.

One of the greatest objections to my mind to this bill is, that it makes an appropriation for the aid of the education of the people of the North where it is not needed, and where the money will prove an injury to the existing system of common schools which, supported and controlled by the States alone, has made such unexampled progress, has achieved such grand results. In a word, sir, I do not believe that the cause of education or the general welfare of this country demands that money should be appropriated out of the Federal Treasury to aid education in the North, and the fact that it does raises to my mind one of the greatest constitutional objections to the bill. And, sir, inasmuch as it is admitted that the necessity for this aid is the illiteracy of the colored people of the South I should much prefer that whatever money is appropriated for the cause of education in the South should be made directly and exclusively for the education of that race and for the support of colored schools. The constitutional objections which could be made to such a bill——

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to make a statment there?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand the suggestion of the Senator to be that it is proposed to make this appropriation directly for the education of colored illiterates of the South.

Mr. DOLPH. I think so.

Mr. GEORGE. I would suggest this difficulty to the Senator on that subject, that by the constitution of the State of Mississippi and the other Southern States the school fund is directed to be appropriated equally and impartially to the two races without distinction on that subject, and that by the act of admission or readmission into the Union of the Southern States the provisions of their constitutions on this subject are made fundamental conditions, and that the result of a law now giving this fund exclusively to the colored people would be that the colored people would be entitled to share equally with the whites in the State school fund which is insufficient for both races, not only the school fund that now exists, but any that might be raised, and then in addition to that they would have this Congressional bounty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend from Mississippi for information what the state of things is on this point? I understand him to say that by the law of Mississippi, whether constitution or statute no matter, there is no discrimination between colored and white children in respect of receiving the benefit of the school fund.

Mr. GEORGE. None whatever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, does the law of Mississippi provide for separate white and colored schools, or is the education common?

Mr. GEORGE. It provides for separate schools.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the provision of law which distributes the fund distribute it to those separate schools as such, or how?

Mr. GEORGE. The common-school fund is distributed in Mississippi in about this way: The teachers are paid per capita for the scholars, so much for each scholar that attends school, and wherever a school can be gotten up of sufficient numbers to authorize the employment of a teacher or a teacher can be gotten at the price per capita allowed by law, one is established.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator, with the permission of my friend from Oregon——

Mr. DOLPH. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask how many white schools, in round numbers, there are in Mississippi or were in the last year, or the year before that?

Mr. GEORGE. I am very sorry that I am not able to answer that question. Before I came here this winter I procured a statement from the superintendent of education upon that subject, giving the number of white schools, the number of colored schools, the number of teachers employed in each, and the number of children attending each. When the discussion arose upon this question I looked for that paper and I was unable to find it. I have a general knowledge, though, of this sort, because I am pretty familiar with the condition of things there, and I feel authorized to state that there are as many or more colored children attending the common schools of Mississippi than there are whites. I feel safe in making that statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I suppose among the children of school age there must be two or three times as many colored children as white children in that State.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no, not two or three times. There is a majority, about one hundred and seventy-five thousand or one hundred and eighty thousand majority of colored people in the State of Mississippi out of a million and a quarter people.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is not all this information to be found in the published reports of the superintendent of education or some official of that State?

Mr. GEORGE. I presume so. I have not looked that up. I had that paper, or I thought I had it among my papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. About what year were these school laws made in respect to the distribution of the funds? Whereabouts in the statutes of Mississippi can this information be got?

Mr. GEORGE. In answer to that I will state that the present school system was inaugurated immediately after the adoption of the constitution in 1869, and the laws enacted in Mississippi from 1869 up to 1876 were enacted by Legislatures that were supposed especially to represent the colored people. I suppose the Senator understands that. They were Republicans, and a majority of them were elected by the votes of the colored people. Since 1876 the majority has been Democratic in the State Legislature, and I suppose laws have been passed all along during all these years from 1870 up to the present time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask from what the school fund of Mississippi is derived? By direct taxation, or out of a fund, or how?

Mr. GEORGE. The school fund of Mississippi is derived, first, from all fines and forfeitures for breaches of the criminal laws, the licenses for retailing vinous and spirituous liquors, receipts from the redemption—that is a singular provision of our constitution—from the redemption of land when forfeited to the State for non-payment of taxes. This seems to be the rule on that subject. In Mississippi if taxes are not paid on a tract of land it is put up by the tax-collector and offered for sale. If a private individual buys it, he gets title to the land and the money goes into the treasury. If no private purchaser will bid the amount of tax due upon the land, then the land is knocked off to the State; the State becomes the purchaser. Then, say, for two years—I believe that is the time—the owner has a right to redeem the land. The redemption money when the land once goes to the State goes into the common-school fund, although the tax on that land of itself would not have gone there. I believe those are the general sources of the fund.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All this is merely a current fund; there is no permanent fund?

Mr. GEORGE. I am going on now to make a statement. Then there is local taxation.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to resume.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very nearly through. My colleague reminds me of another fund. Under the constitution the Legislature may levy a poll-tax not exceeding $2 per head. I believe about $1 is now levied, owing to the difficulty of collecting the larger amount. Of the colored people not one in ten paid the poll-tax at the higher price, and it is now fixed at $1. But by the constitution of the State that poll-tax goes exclusively to the school fund. In other words, the polls can not be taxed in Mississippi except for school purposes. Then there are local taxes in the counties levied in the counties for schools in the counties, and then the State—I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to this—without levying any special school-tax, the Legislature every year makes an appropriation of one or two hundred thousand dollars out of the general fund raised by the State for school purposes.

I believe I have about answered the question.

Mr. DOLPH. I am not going to occupy many minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not mean to trouble the Senator.

Mr. DOLPH. It is no trouble. I do not see from the statement of the Senator from Mississippi that there would be any difficulty in applying this fund as I have suggested. If it is true that the illiteracy of the colored race is the necessity which calls for Federal aid, and if it is also true that in Mississippi there are separate schools, schools for the white and schools for the colored children, I see, I say, no difficulty in applying the fund which is appropriated by the Federal Government to aid the colored schools, and there is no reason why colored children should not also participate in the funds which are raised by the State for the purposes of education.

I do not think that there would be any graver constitutional objections to such a bill than can be urged to this bill. As was said by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], this bill does not proceed upon the idea of equality between the States. Under its provisions the Northern States will receive small apportionments out of this money, and they will contribute large sums to the fund; and the Southern States will receive correspondingly large sums and contribute correspondingly small sums; so that the bill can not be defended upon the principle of equality; and if equality between the States is at all necessary in the appropriation of money from the Federal Treasury for the purpose of education, then this bill is palpably unconstitutional; and, besides, the same objection could be raised to every appropriation which we make annually for the support of Indian schools that could be raised against a bill making appropriations for colored schools alone.

But, sir, I do not believe that equality is necessary. I think the constitutionality of this measure, if affirmed at all, must be affirmed on other principles. The people of this country, North and South, are one people with equal rights and privileges guaranteed by one Constitution and regulated by general laws prescribing equal obligations and duties. Within the limits of the Federal Constitution this nation is a unit, and Congress in its benefactions and in the exercise of its powers should know no section of this country. The common defense and the general welfare are intrusted to Congress, and it should be a matter of constant solicitude how they can best be promoted. A danger in New York or in Oregon or in Mississippi or in Alabama which threatens the political fabric is a national danger, whether that danger arises from the fact that a considerable portion of the citizens of those States intrusted with the ballot are illiterate or from force or fraud which prevents an intelligent and free and full expression of the will of the majority at the polls; and when such a danger exists it is the duty of the General Government, through its legislative department, to remove the danger by appropriate legislation.

The fathers of the Republic believed that the prosperity and happiness of the people and the perpetuity of republican institutions depended upon the intelligence and virtue of the people and their belief has become crystallized into an axiom in our politics. A large amount of illiteracy in any government is a menace to it. The remedy for such an evil, the defense against such a danger, is to educate. As was said by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] the other day the paramount duty of educating the illiterates in any State lies with the State itself; and it is as much the duty of Mississippi and Alabama and Georgia to educate their illiterate citizens as it is of all the other States of the Union. But when for any cause an illiterate population in any State can not be educated, and when in the opinion of Congress the illiteracy exists to such an extent as to imperil the prosperity of the people and the perpetuity of the Government, I believe it to be the duty of Congress, legislating for the common defense and the general welfare, to eradicate the evil and to defend against the danger.

It will be seen that I base the constitutionality of this measure entirely upon the existence of illiteracy in the several States to such an extent as to call for Federal aid. I do not stop to inquire who is responsible for that illiteracy, but I am not willing to admit that the people of the North or the Federal Government are under any moral or legal obligation to the Southern States or the colored people of the South to educate them because being slaves they were made free and have been made citizens of the United States. The people of the North have committed no crime against the colored people of the South. The Federal Government has done no injury to the Southern States or to the people of the Southern States, white or black.

Sir, I glory in the history and the achievements of the great Union Republican party, in its administration of the National Government, including the striking of the fetters from four millions of slaves and making them freemen, and I have no excuse and no apology and no restitution to offer.

The colored people of the Southern States do not exert that influence which they are entitled to by virtue of their numerical strength. "Knowledge is power." Education will complete that which was begun by the emancipation proclamation and the fifteenth amendment. It will teach men who are free by the will of thepeople of the United States, as expressed in the Federal Constitution, to know their rights, and, as was said yesterday by the Senator from New Hampshire, knowing their rights dare to maintain them.

The senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] the other day spoke to us about the influence of education in settling and developing the Northern States. He drew a vivid picture of the march of civilization from Plymouth Rock to the shores of the Pacific, and grand as the story was it was not overdrawn. There is no doubt that the thrift and energy and enterprise which have swept across the continent on parallel lines from the shores of New England, overcoming every obstacle, subduing every foe, transforming the wilderness into fertile fields and populous cities, laying the foundations of great and populous and wealthy States, is largely the outgrowth of the general diffusion of knowledge by the common school system.

Sir, I trust I have a just pride in the achievements of the people of the North. I know something of their privations, of their toils, and of their successes, but I listened with no greater degree of pride or pleasure to the story of their achievements than I did to the recitals of the wonderful advancement which the people of the South have made in every branch of material prosperity since the war. The prosperity of any portion of the country is the prosperity of the whole, and I see in the increasing prosperity of the South, in her increasing manufacturing interests, in her increased facilities for transportation and travel, in the newly-awakened and growing interest in education, a prophecy and a promise of a glorious future when the South in wealth, in prosperity, in the general diffusion of knowledge, and I hope too in the free exercise by all her citizens of all their civil and political rights, will rival any other portion of our common country; and I pray God to speed that day.

I read not many days since an article reviewing the Blair bill published in the Inter Ocean, of Chicago, under the caption of "National Education." It was written by a gentleman who has had large opportunities to observe the social and political and educational systems of the South, a gentleman who has made this question of national aid to education a study, a gentleman who is thoroughly in favor of educating the colored population of the South, but who believes that this bill with its present provisions would be unjust to the people of the South, and would not accomplish the object for which it was intended. If I could expunge some of the more vigorous expressions concerning the dominant party in the South without doing injustice to the author and without impairing his presentation of the case I should be glad to do it, but as I can not do it I ask leave to incorporate the whole in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper sent to the desk by the Senator from Oregon will be inserted in the RECORD by the Reporter.

The paper is as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., February 13.

The educational bill now before the Senate is a curious instance of the lack of political knowledge and sagacity on the part of legislators who merely jump at an idea without taking the trouble to investigate details. So far as the matters herein referred to are concerned, it is identical with the Blair bill which passed the Senate at the last session of Congress and the Willis bill, which was reported to the House but failed to be reached on the Calendar. These measures are based on the following hypothesis:

1. That a sum of money be appropriated to each State for the cure of illiteracy—the amount assigned to each being estimated on the number of illiterates in each State, according to the census of 1880.

2. That the same shall be used by the respective States for the promotion of elementary education in the public schools, without distinction as to race.

As a result about four-fifths of the fund will go to the Southern States, as it ought to do, in order to remove of both races in that region. The necessity for this is readily shown by the following tables, compiled from the census of 1880:

THE OVERWHELMING IGNORANCE

	Total population.	Illiterates ten years old and upward.
The North	31,938,459	1,442,064
The South	18,217,324	4,808,528
Total	50,155,783	6,250,592

In fact, the measure is designed really to aid the educational interests of the South, which were prevented from keeping pace with those of the North by the fact of slavery in the antebellum days, so that the burden of properly educating the masses is now greater than those States can possibly bear. This is not only just and proper because of the nation's responsibility for slavery, by which the North became a partaker in its profits and responsible for its injustice, but is also a matter of sound policy. The nation, by Congressional action and its unavoidable results, gave the freedman of the South the ballot. By this means the property qualification which had been attached to the exercise of the elective franchise in most of those States was broken down and suffrage made universal among the whites also. The result of this is that the whole mass of Southern ignorance is represented in our national affairs either by the exercise of balloting power by illiterate voters or their deprivation of such privilege because of the weakness resulting from their ignorance. The extent of the peril arising from this may be seen by examining the following table:

Illiterates ten years old and upward.

State.	Illiterates.	Per cent. of population.
Virginia	430,352	40.6
North Carolina	463,975	48.3
South Carolina	369,848	55.4
Georgia	520,416	49.9
Florida	80,183	43.4
Alabama	433,447	50.9
Mississippi	373,201	49.5
Louisiana	318,380	49.1
Total illiterates in eight States	2,989,802
Average per cent. of illiteracy		48.4
Average per cent. in the Northern States and Territories		8.5

No one can dream for a moment that republican institutions are safe when 75 per cent. of a majority in Senate, House of Representatives, and the electoral college is controlled by a population 48 per cent. of which are unable to read and write. In fact, no thoughtful man will fail to perceive that the whole sum of $10,000,000 a year, or thereabouts, should be expended at the South. The Northern States do not need the pittance each would receive, and it seems almost farcical to include them in the bill. It should have embraced only those States in which the percentage of illiterates exceeded 12 per cent. of the population, and should cease as to any State as soon as its percentage of illiteracy was reduced to that limit. This proportion of ignorance is easily handled by the States themselves, and may be accounted not dangerous to the nation.

The most important fact connected with the measure, however, is the relation it bears to the education of the two races. It should be borne in mind that in all the Southern States the schools for the two races are distinct, and the funds for their support are now distributed according to the number of each race in the separate school districts, or else according to the number of children of each race within the school ages, as prescribed by the laws of the respective States. Practically there is no difference in these standards; to distribute according to the number of children is in effect to distribute according to the proportion of the two races. So that, if a State have 1,000,000 whites and 500,000 blacks, the white schools will have twice as much money as the colored schools.

The bill in question requires the fund thereby appropriated to be distributed in the same manner as the respective school funds, though it is assigned to the States on the basis of illiteracy. According to the report of the House committee of the last Congress the State would receive on account of each illiterate about $1.50 on the basis of an appropriation of $10,000,000. This sum, distributed as proposed, would give to the white schools of each State more than one-half of the whole sum, though only about one-fourth of the illiterates are of that race. In other words, instead of the national fund going to the education of the respective races in the ratio of their illiteracy each white illiterate will draw from this fund two or three times as much as the colored illiterate in the same State.

The following table will show the practical operation of this measure:

Black and white illiteracy, census of 1880, ten years old and upward.

States.	White.		Black.
	Illiterates.	Per cent.	Illiterates.	Per cent.
Virginia	114,692	18.2	315,660	73.7
North Carolina	192,032	31.5	271,943	77.4
South Carolina	59,777	21.9	310,071	78.5
Georgia	128,934	22.9	391,482	81.6
Florida	19,763	19.9	60,420	70.7
Alabama	111,767	24.7	321,680	80.6
Mississippi	53,448	16.3	319,753	75.2
Louisiana	58,951	18.4	259,429	79.1
Total	739,364	22.2	2,250,438	78.1

It will be seen that there were almost three times as many colored as white illiterates, and, considering the character of the appropriation and the fact that all the school-houses and educational equipment of the ante-war systems in those States are held by and for the use of the white race, it would seem as if good policy and common sense would demand that the remedy should be spread somewhat evenly upon the sore—that the colored schools should be benefited somewhat in proportion to the amount to be received by the State on account of colored illiteracy. The following tables will show what would actually occur under the provisions of this bill. See foregoing table for the number of white and colored illiterates in each State, and for the amounts that would be received by several States on account of white and colored illiterates respectively on a basis of $10,000,000, or $1.60 for each illiterate:

States.	Received on account of white illiterates.	Paid on account of colored illiterates.
Virginia	$184,424	$505,172
North Carolina	308,316	435,184
South Carolina	98,817	493,883
Georgia	205,688	612,312
Florida	32,000	96,000
Alabama	179,252	515,348
Mississippi	85,199	512,801
Louisiana	94,623	415,377
Total	1,182,406	3,600,692

In other words, these eight Southern States would receive from the national Treasury on account of 739,364 white illiterates $1,182,406, and on account of 2,250,438 colored illiterates would receive annually $3,600,692 of the public funds of the nation. How would this be divided between the races? Who would be the real beneficiaries of the fund under the provisions of this bill? If distributed as the bill requires, supposing not a dollar to be lost or wasted, the white and colored schools would receive it in the proportions shown in the following table:

Amounts that white and colored schools would receive respectively under the Blair bill in several States.

States.	Population.		Schools would receive—
	White.	Colored.	White.	Colored.
Virginia	880,858	631,707	$401,877	$287,728
North Carolina	867,242	532,505	460,718	282,782
South Carolina	391,105	604,472	233,916	358,784
Georgia	816,906	725,274	442,528	391,472
Florida	142,605	126,888	71,763	56,237
Alabama	662,185	600,320	364,363	330,237
Mississippi	479,398	652,199	253,265	344,735
Louisiana	454,954	484,992	247,125	202,875
Total	4,695,253	4,335,357	2,475,555	2,314,850

In other words, these States receiving $1,182,406 from the national Treasury on account of 739,364 white illiterates, and $3,600,692 on account of 2,250,438 colored illiterates, will apply $2,475,555 of this fund to white schools, and only $2,314,850 of it to colored schools. So that while each illiterate black and white alike will draw $1.60 from the national Treasury for the benefit of the State, each white illiterate will receive for his education in a white school several times the amount that will be applied to the education of the colored illiterate in the schools of his race.

The following table shows the comparison between the amounts applied for the benefit of each:

Comparative value of white and colored illiteracy under the Blair bill.

States.	Amount received from General Government for each illiterate.	Amount applied to white schools for each white illiterate.	Amount applied to colored schools for each colored illiterate.
Virginia	$1 60	$3 54	$0 90
North Carolina	1 60	2 60	1 03
South Carolina	1 60	3 89	1 15
Georgia	1 60	3 43	99
Florida	1 60	3 63	93
Alabama	1 60	3 26	1 02
Mississippi	1 60	4 73	1 07
Louisiana	1 60	4 21	1 01

It is no wonder the most ardent Bourbons of the South are in favor of the Blair bill. It enables them to make the ignorant negro simply a cat's-paw with which to pull chestnuts out of the fire for the benefit of themselves. Such sentimental obstructionists as Mr. Blair may think that the colored man, when he comes to understand the full force and effect of this measure, will feel highly gratified to know that those who made his ignorance compulsory, who made it a felony to teach a slave and a misdemeanor to teach a free black to read or write, are now able to appropriate the lion's share of the nation's bounty to their own use and benefit. There seems to be almost no limit to the capacity of our Northern legislators to play into the hands of their Southern antagonists.

The Republican party fairly forced upon the negro the power of the ballot, for the negro's sake, of course, and had hardly begun to boast of its sagacity in so doing before the ku-klux klan wrenched it from the negro's feeble hand and appropriated its power for the advantage of the Bourbon Democracy. Now, Mr. BLAIR and his company of heedless enthusiasts are anxious to immortalize themselves by appropriating money under the plea of educating colored illiterates, to be used instead for the benefit of those who kept the negro in ignorance, and will keep him in subjection until he becomes strong enough to assert his rights and manfully maintain them.

It is no wonder, in view of these facts, that the cheap, simple, practical method which I had the honor to present to the country in "An Appeal to Cæsar," a year ago, was so bitterly assailed by the Bourbon leaders of the South. By that plan waste and misappropriation were made practically impossible; and the colored schools of every township were secured the benefit of just that proportion of the fund to which the colored illiterates of the township entitled them. In other words, colored illiteracy would have been enabled to share fairly and equally with white illiteracy in the nation's bounty. If this outrage on the just rights of the colored people of the South shall be consummated by the active agency of Republican Senators, the negro will have reason to pray to be delivered from his friends almost as heartily as he besought relief from bondage.

ALBION W. TOURGEE.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy the attention of the Senate more than five minutes. I have taken no part in this discussion. I am in great doubt as to how I shall vote upon this bill. It will depend somewhat upon the shape which I shall find that it has assumed when it reaches a final vote. But I have been studying the figures of this case somewhat and I want to put them in the RECORD so that if they are wrong they can be corrected.

I think this bill receives its support in my section of the country, in my State, because good, philanthropic people believe that we ought to aid largely in the education of colored children at the South. I believe the people whom I represent think that the object and design and effect of this bill is to accomplish that purpose. If the figures which I have made up are correct, a very small portion of this money is going for the education of colored children in the South.

Out of the whole $77,000,000 but between $18,000,000 and $19,000,000 are to be applied, according to this bill, to the education of colored children in the South. What I want to do, what I would be glad to do by a bill, is to appropriate money for that purpose alone. I do not want to aid the Southern States in the education of white children, and I do not want the General Government to aid the Northern States in the education of any children. The thing that troubles me about voting for this bill is that it asks me to vote $58,000,000 and over for the education of white children and only between $18,000,000 and $19,000,000 for the education of colored children.

I have taken from the tables furnished by the Senator from New Hampshire in his speech, the amount of money which each State is to receive under this bill. I have it carried out in each case, even to dollars and cents. By it I find that the Northern States and Territories receive $18,571,468, leaving for the Southern States $58,428,532. The items are as follows:

Amount to be paid to free States and Territories.

Arizona	$72,388 30	Nevada	$50,419 04
California	662,051 95	New Hampshire	177,216 30
Colorado	129,783 50	New Jersey	659,809 18
Connecticut	352,202 22	New Mexico	708,220 88
Dakota	59,737 09	New York	2,721,066 98
Idaho	22,031 23	Ohio	1,633,718 21
Illinois	1,801,616 46	Oregon	91,978 52
Indiana	1,372,441 26	Pennsylvania	2,825,324 98
Iowa	577,532 84	Rhode Island	307,210 44
Kansas	489,147 72	Utah	109,363 10
Maine	274,708 81	Vermont	196,236 51
Massachusetts	1,152,116 61	Washington	48,188 66
Michigan	789,592 67	Wisconsin	698,420 03
Minnesota	428,060 02	Wyoming	6,889 40
Montana	21,151 46
Nebraska	142,843 63	Total	18,571,468 00

Amount to be paid to former slave States.

Alabama	$5,370,848 45	Missouri	$2,586,674 03
Arkansas	2,560,170 97	North Carolina	5,749,121 37
Delaware	240,359 17	South Carolina	4,582,792 26
Florida	993,548 79	Tennessee	5,089,262 62
Georgia	6,448,482 66	Texas	3,920,914 78
Kentucky	4,316,930 63	Virginia	5,332,498 25
Louisiana	3,945,051 48	West Virginia	1,057,895 33
Maryland	1,666,442 88
Mississippi	4,624,339 33	Total	58,428,532 00

Now, turning to page 1270 of the RECORD containing the Senator's speech of February 10, I find that there are in the Southern States which are to receive these $58,000,000, of white school population, 3,899,961; of colored school population, 1,803,257. In other words, the school population of the South which is to receive these $58,428,532, is 68.3 per cent. white. Now divide that $58,428,532 between the white children and the colored children and you will find that 68.3 per cent of it, which by this bill must, I suppose, be applied to the education of the white children unless a distinction is made, and I understand none is intended by the bill, would give for the education of white children in the South $39,954,014 and for the education of colored children only $18,464,518.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly; but I am really through with my remarks.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to know where you run the line as between the South and the North.

Mr. PLATT. In the Southern States I include Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia.

Mr. GEORGE. Are Maryland and Delaware left out?

Mr. PLATT. No; I spoke of Delaware and Maryland. I include all the former slave States. I only desire to put these figures in the RECORD that they may be corrected if they are not accurate.

Mr. BLAIR. I can as well explain to the Senator on his point now as at any time. He is correct in stating that the theory of the bill is to instruct white and colored children alike, to give them the same assistance from the National Government, or to so apply this money that it shall result in white and colored children having the same opportunity for education. The figures which he gives us show the just proportion existing between the white and colored school populations of the South. About two-thirds are white and one-third colored. He says sixty-eight and a fraction per cent. are white and the rest are colored. If it were just 33⅓ per cent. colored it would be just 66⅔ per cent. white, so that you see mathematically the relation between the two races is almost that of 2 to 1.

The theory of the bill is that there shall be no difference between the education of the white child and of the colored child, and it is quite as much for the benefit of the colored children who are to live with the white children now and hereafter that their white associates whose parents have subjected them to indignities in the past shall be elevated by education so that they will have a living chance among them. That is the theory of the bill; and in order to secure this equalization of school privileges, the bill does not say that this amount which the National Government contributes shall be divided exactly per capita between all the children, white and black. The theory of the bill being that there shall be no discrimination between the children of the two races and that an equalization of school privileges or advantages shall be secured to all regardless of color, the bill provides, in the tenth section, which I incorporated in my remarks yesterday, that the fund coming from the National Government combined as it will be with the State school fund, the whole shall be so distributed as to secure this equality of school privileges.

If, as is suspected by many, and as is complained of by some—and I do not know whether it may not be admitted in some instances is the case—the white child at present receives a larger proportion of the school funds at the South than the colored child, then if this money is distributed according to the provisions of this bill the colored children will come to share more largely of it; and this is the way that the money of the national appropriation combined with the money of the State appropriation, the whole is to be distributed then in violation of the practice which has thus far obtained in the South where there is this discrimination in favor of the white race. The whole hereafter is to be so distributed that there shall be no discrimination. If it is not so distributed, then when the question comes to Congress whether there shall be a further appropriation the Congress may withhold any further appropriation, and it is tried year by year to see whether this rule of distribution is observed, the funds of the National Government being applied with those of the State government and the whole distributed in such a way as to give an actual equalization of school privileges to all. That is the theory of the bill, and I do not know how it can be made to serve the purpose any more perfectly.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Does he think that in New England, for instance—I do not like to speak of anything which has a sectional sound—but does he think that in that portion of the country which we both represent it is understood generally among the public that this bill is for the purpose of aiding the education both of white and colored children, and that such a large proportion of the money appropriated will go for the purpose of the education of white children?

Mr. BLAIR. I certainly think so. I think the people all through the country who take an interest in this bill understand that it is to secure this equalization of school advantages. As a matter of fact the people of the North, or at least great numbers of them, believe that the colored race is discriminated against. I believe that it is discriminated against in many localities. I have come to believe that as a rule the disposition in the Southern States of the dominant race is to do justice to the colored child; but that a discrimination exists there to some extent I doubt not, and therefore it is that the tenth section of this bill provides that the money shall be so used as to secure an equalization of advantages. If you could treat the school fund of the State and the school fund coming from the nation as separate amounts or sums of money, and they were to be distributed separately and the school fund of the State should continue to be distributed with discrimination as in the past it is supposed to have been, then under the provisions of this bill the school fund coming from the national Treasury must be given more absolutely to the colored population, and if necessary must go in toto to the colored population; otherwise that equalization of school privileges can not be secured which the bill demands and which must be carried out so far as it possibly can be, or there will be no subsequent annual appropriation.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion? The distribution of the fund under this bill is based on the illiteracy of those of ten years of age and upward. That being the basis, the illiteracy, why could it not be distributed according to the illiteracy of the white and colored children? In that way you certainly would give the colored children a greater proportion than you do by this scheme. If that is the intention of the bill—and it seems to me it ought to be at least—why not amend the bill in that respect so as to distribute according to the illiteracy of the two classes of people?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know how that could be done without involving great difficulties, and probably resulting in discrimination. We certainly should recognize it if, by so doing, the money should be distributed to some extent on the basis of color. The bill undertakes to obliterate that distinction; and the bill, in order to insure that obliteration and that equality of privileges, provides that all the children shall have an equality of privilege, and the money shall so go.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator misunderstands me. The money is appropriated from the Treasury by this bill based on the illiteracy of persons ten years old and upward. That does not discriminate at all. But in the distribution for school purposes, when we come to distribute the fund to the schools in the States, why could it not be distributed then on the basis of the illiteracy of the races in each class of schools? There are two kinds of schools, we find, in Mississippi and other States—two classes of schools, colored schools and white schools. Why, then, not distribute this money according to the illiteracy of the two races of school age in the States where these two races exist to such an extent? It does seem to me that would be fair, and in that way you would do what the intention of this bill was when it first started out some years ago, because we started it on the proposition that we were going to try to educate the colored people. I think we have moved some distance away from that. I have no amendment prepared and have none to suggest. I merely ask a question.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me a moment on that very point?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. Let me answer the Senator from Illinois. The idea of the bill is that the national fund and the State fund shall be combined and the whole distributed without reference to color at all. If, however, the Senator's idea should be adopted and the national fund be distributed upon the basis of illiteracy as between the colored and the white, the State fund would of course be distributed upon the same condition, and it ought to be and would be, and the result would be just exactly the same as if you were to combine the two funds and distribute them according to the school population.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, no; the Senator is very much mistaken as to the suggestions I made. We are not dealing with the State fund at all; we are dealing with the national fund to be appropriated from the National Treasury; and in fact it seems as though this bill has purposely avoided the hand of the nation having anything to do with this money except to appropriate it. It seems as though that had been studiously avoided in this bill. So it would not refer at all to the State appropriation or to the State school fund, but merely to the national fund that is appropriated by this bill in aid of the State. That fund is certainly a separate fund, and if it goes into the treasury of the State the State officers certainly know the amount received, and it is very easy to make a computation of the amount received and distribute that according to the illiteracy of the children of the different races. There are two classes of schools kept up in the Southern States.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is certainly right in saying that the true distinctive theory of the bill has been to make the appropriation to the States, to trust the States, and require certain conditions in expenditure to be complied with, and if they are not complied with then to withhold the subsequent appropriations until they are complied with, or wholly if future Congresses should see fit to exercise their discretion in that way. It has never been understood that this appropriation was to be followed into the State as a separate and distinctive fund. It has never been claimed on this floor in any of the former discussions that it would be right that this money should be appropriated as a separate national fund and expended by the national hand or its expenditure within the States superintended any further than to enforce a compliance with the conditions contained in the act by which the money was originally given. If now it should be proposed to adopt a bill based on an entirely different theory of course we have new grounds to discuss and new conclusions to be drawn. But this bill, as the Senator well says, studiously attempts to avoid anything like an interference by the national hand with the money after it passes to the State, but trust to the honor of the State, and requires of the State an account of all it has done, and if it fails to comply with the conditions which are imposed with the gift then the nation has its remedy.

It has been thought that it was not best that the nation should undertake to interfere with the management of the common schools in the States and that the States should not be taught that they could be relieved of their obligation to take care of the colored child as well as the white child.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He says, and correctly, that this bill does not interfere with the action of the States in any affirmative way; but the bill certainly does say that this money shall be appropriated so as not to distinguish between white children and colored children, does it not?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly; there shall be no discrimination on account of color.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That being the state of the case, it still authorizes in express terms each State to have separate schools for white children and for colored children, and to have the benefit of this money accordingly, and that shall not be considered a discrimination.

Mr. BLAIR. It does not require them to have such schools.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, but it authorizes them to do it.

Mr. BLAIR. To have them where they now exist.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That being the state of the case, where is the objection in point of constitution or of fitness to saying that where a State does have a separate system of white and colored schools, according to their respective needs by the numbers of the children of each of these schools, they shall have this aid?

Mr. BLAIR. This bill does say so. It says so in those words in the tenth section, where it requires that all the children in the State, irrespective of color, shall, by the operations of this bill, come to receive an equalization of school advantages or school privileges.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, if that is the object——

Mr. BLAIR. Let me answer further, because it is necessary to do so. The Senator seems to be assuming, and others seem to be understanding, that all the children in the State can be reached even by the action of this bill. He seems to be assuming, too, that all the children in the Southern States will be divided into white and colored schools. Now as a rule that is already the case, and both races seem to like it the better, but nevertheless it is not universally the case.

There are many schools in the sparsely settled districts where the people are very poor, where the white child and the colored child study together in the same schools. The Senator will remember that years ago we of the North looked with great reprehension upon the establishment of any distinction in the matter of schools between the two races, and I think it was only when we found that the colored race as a whole preferred schools of their own that we came to acquiesce in the existing order of things; and to-day we should find quite as much difficulty in forcing an amalgamation or combination of the races in the same school from the colored people as we do from the whites; but nevertheless that is a feeling which is gradually passing away and will pass away, and ought to pass away, and as intelligence increases the tendency will be enhanced.

I would not like to see entering into the national legislation any feature that would seem to look to the permanency of the existing condition in regard to separate schools; but the prejudice being for the present time such that it would be impossible to combine them together, the bill provides that for the present the matter of separate schools shall not be considered a discrimination as between the races.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My question was this: If I correctly understand the Senator from New Hampshire, this bill is now intended to prevent, and, as he thinks, does prevent, any discrimination in the application of this fund between white and colored children and white and colored schools; and, inasmuch as a good many Senators feel that it does allow such discrimination, why not make it clear and plain that no such discrimination shall exist, and while we recognize, as the Senator's bill does, the present propriety, or at least not the present impropriety, of the separate education of the two classes, and say in plain terms that where any State has a separate system of white and colored schools according to the respective needs of these two classes, according to the number of their children who need education in their respective school districts and counties, this money shall be distributed? If that is the theory of this bill let us make it plain and say so.

Mr. BLAIR. I think the bill in requiring that every child irrespective of color shall have an equality of school advantages, so far as that may be produced by this act in connection with the school fund applied by the State itself, does say so and says so by a rule which, like the Golden Rule, is the most exacting of any; and if we undertake by express provisions to in any way insure anything more generally applicable than the rule laid down in the bill, I think we shall be likely as we go into particulars to injure the efficiency of the bill.

The time to make particular specific enactments amendatory of this law is when by virtue of a year's operation of it we have found that the law is imperfect. The law is in general, comprehensive terms like the Declaration of Independence, which requires freedom for all men, and when we find that there is in its practical operation any failure to work out its theory, we can then legislate with an intelligence and a directness that may give efficiency.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I was under the impression that the best time to amend a bill was when it was under consideration, and not to pass it imperfectly and take the chances of amending it afterward. Perhaps I am wrong as to the best methods of legislation. If I am right in that, this bill being now under consideration and the Senator from New Hampshire saying that the purpose of the bill is, and as he thinks the language of it is, to exclude every discrimination between the necessities of the white and the colored child, then I wish to know why it is not proper to say so in explicit terms as it can be applied to the various States where they have separate schools for the white and the colored, and therefore to say plainly and fairly on the very theory of the bill as he states it—and I have no doubt that was its theory—so that there can be no dispute about it, that in a State where there are kept up white and colored schools, those two races shall be aided in accordance with the numbers of children of each race; so that if in the State of Vermont there are ninety-nine white schools and only one colored school and there are ninety-nine white children of the school age to one of the colored children of the school age, in that State this fund shall be apportioned according to the respective needs of those two races and their respective schools; and if the case is the reverse in the State of Mississippi or in the State of North Carolina or wherever, and there are three colored children and three colored schools to every one white child and every one white school, give this bounty of the United States, if we may call it a bounty—and I do not mean that in the sense of a mere gift; I think it is a duty—give what we call a bounty for a short word, according to the necessities of the case as it is in that particular State. So if there are three colored children and three colored schools to one white in Mississippi, let the three colored schools get three-fourths of the whole number and the one white school get the one-fourth of the whole number of dollars that we give to that State for this purpose.

Is not that fair? The Senator says that is the theory of the bill. If it be the theory of the bill, as it ought to be, then let us say so now when the bill is under consideration, and not wait for the ultimate bias of ulterior events, as some politician said, to bring about a rectification of wrong legislation which we enact now.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I am not so much impressed by the difficulty of my honorable friend from Connecticut or by the difficulty of my honorable friend from Vermont as I am almost always with the suggestions which those very able and clear-minded Senators see fit to make.

Now, as I understand, the theory of this bill is a very simple one. We find in certain States in this Union a degree of ignorance in grown people and in children alike, likely to continue under existing provisions for education for a long and indefinite period, which in the judgment of those of us who favor any legislation on this subject constitutes a menace to the safety of the life of the nation itself. We suppose that in a nation largely founded by Puritans, wholly founded by races of men accustomed to self-government under institutions founded upon moral rules and moral distinctions, the moral relations are as important as the physical; and if we have the right to draw the sword and slay to preserve the life of this nation menaced in war, we have the right to open the purse and give to preserve the life of the nation menaced by a destruction of the intelligence necessary for republican self-government in time of peace. And that is the constitutional proposition upon which, to my mind, this bill must rest.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator sometimes interrupts me. Will he allow me to interrupt him? I quite agree with him that when illiteracy reaches the point where it becomes a menace to the existence, I might say the fair prosperity of the nation, there is constitutional ground for national interference; but my trouble is this, and I am seeking information as to how I ought to vote——

Mr. HOAR. I would rather finish part of my speech and come to that hereafter, than be compelled to depart from what I was saying to take that up now.

Mr. PLATT. I wanted to ask the Senator this question: Does he think in Massachusetts or Connecticut or New Hampshire there is any such illiteracy as menaces the existence or the prosperity of the Government; and, if not, how does he justify the appropriation of money for education in those States?

Mr. HOAR. If my honorable friend agrees with me in the fundamental proposition upon which he and I can rest legislation of this kind one important step toward the result has been accomplished and taken.

Now he asks me why it is that, finding this nation menaced by the fact that recent events and recent constitutional and legal changes have brought into the government, the administration of the State, a degree of ignorance increasing the proportion which was there before—why, finding that, and proposing to protect the life of the nation in the future against that danger, that destruction, I simply propose to do it by a bill which is general and not particular or individual in its application? The answer to that is, that it is because in all legislation it is desirable to legislate by universals and not by particulars. We legislate in Connecticut and in Massachusetts mortgaging, and it is the bottom mortgage on every dollar of the property of the rich man and poor man alike, house and palace and farm and railroad, to give every child in those States a good common-school education. I might as well get up and ask, "Is there any danger that the child of General HAWLEY or Senator PLATT will want an education if the State does not provide it? Are not these men well enough off?" The answer is that your system is better, that it secures national care, national control, national supervision, national jealousy, by having all the citizens of the United States or of the State which is acting in the particular case, on some general theory receive its benefits.

The scheme of this bill is this: You find a necessity which is represented by 100 and you find means of meeting that necessity which would secure education for the State, which is only represented by 7. Now we come in and say, let the nation eke out the school systems of the country, and let us have a scheme which applies to the whole country alike. If the illiteracy is but one-thousandth of the whole, the State gets the proportion of one to a thousand; if the illiteracy is one-tenth of the whole the State gets relief in proportion as ten is to one hundred; and if the illiteracy is 50 per cent. of the whole, the State gets relief in that proportion. But the rule we go upon in all legislation is to establish some system of universal national application.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question? He did not do me the honor to refer to me in speaking of this suggestion that was made by myself; but I would like to ask him a question. He says now that this bill is for the purpose of bringing the people who were placed in this condition by the Government up to the proper elevation, so far as education is concerned. Now, I desire to ask him if there are any other people, except the colored people brought in, who are in this condition? And, further than that, if this bill goes upon the basis that the illiteracy from ten years up to one hundred shall be counted—and that is the basis of the bill—is not a large proportionate share of this money based upon the older people of that country who are colored people, and the offering of the money because of the fact that these older people are illiterate? If they are the ones upon whose illiteracy the distribution of this money is based, I ask the Senator if the colored people ought not to be the ones who should receive the greatest benefit?

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me, with great respect to the gentlemen who have made this proposition, that it is very much as if a man with a wife and seven children should come to the house of the honorable Senator from Illinois and say, "We have not got provisions enough in our house; I have got enough, about three-fourths of what will keep my family from starving; I wish somebody would help me with the other quarter;" and the Senator should say, "Well, I will help you with the other quarter; the wife and seven children shall all have enough to eat; but I will particularly specify that the old man shall not eat any of the food that comes from me, because he can take care of himself;" or, "the old woman shall not have it; it shall go to the youngest and smallest children." The answer is that if you eke out the fund which in a particular State is needed to supply the necessity of a general common-school system for rich and poor, it not only will lead to countless embarrassments and discomforts, but it will not in the least any more tend to accomplish the result to specify that the particular child who is in ignorance shall be the one who shall have this particular money. You are piecing out your blanket so that it will cover the whole bed. It is not necessary to say to what particular part of the blanket the patch shall be attached.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HOAR. I should a little rather state this fully, and then hear what the Senator has to say at the close, for I rose to make an argument of my own, and not to be cross-examined by the most skillful cross-examiners alive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is quite right in preferring to speak without interruption.

Mr. HOAR. You carry this thing all through. Suppose this aid goes to the State of New York, for example. We will suppose that the State of New York needs an extra $500,000 to make her school system universal. That is the condition of the bill, that every State shall have established a system for the education of all its children without distinction. Now you go the State of New York, and with an additional grant of $500,000 you have got all that New York needs for a reasonable common-school education, and we give her that grant from the Treasury in the case I suppose. Would it be of any sort of use to say: "Why in the city of New York there is an Irish ward, or a German ward, or a Scandinavian ward, where there is not a child who knows how to read and write; let us specify that when New York gets the $500,000 she shall put all of it or so much of it as is their due proportion to their illiteracy there?" The answer is, what you are enabling New York to do is to extend her common-school system over the persons whom it does not reach and cover.

Now, in further answer to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Illinois, it is true that this bill, as was shown the other day, takes as the basis of distribution, considering the fact that the Northern States are to receive so little, persons who are illiterates over ten years of age without any upward limit, instead of confining it to persons between ten years of age and twenty-one; and the effect of that, as was shown by the statistics, is that the South gets a very much less proportion of this grant than it would get if you confined it to children between ten and twenty-one. By the present bill Mississippi gets four times as much as Massachusetts. If you made an amendment confining it to children between ten and twenty-one, Mississippi would get fifteen times as much as Massachusetts, and so on.

The Senator from Vermont inquires why, if you are to give this fund for the purpose of curing an illiteracy, which is largely caused by the addition to our citizenship of the colored population of the South, you do not require a State when it gets the fund to make the distribution between the white and colored schools upon the same principle, especially as the bill recognizes the existence, or does not propose to terminate the existence, by any national authority, or by any condition of this bill of the separation between the two races in the schools. Now, it seems to me that there are several good answers to the question put by the honorable Senator from Vermont. In the first place, I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that it will be a very bad thing indeed whenever we recognize by legislation a race distinction in this country in national legislation.

Mr. LOGAN. You do it in this bill.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think so. The two races have determined, most unwisely as I think, but it is something which probably no legislation can change within any time which this bill covers, that they prefer to educate their children separately. I think it is a very bad determination, one of the most unfortunate things that have happened in the history of this country; but it is absolutely beyond our control, and therefore——

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement right there for his benefit?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I mean to say this, that from the year 1869 to 1876, when it was supposed the colored people and the Republican party controlled Mississippi, when the common-school system was inaugurated, the system of separate schools was inaugurated at the same time and kept up.

Mr. HOAR. I certainly never refused to yield to any Senator when I was addressing the Chair, but it does seem to me that the person who has the floor is entitled to select the time while he occupies it when that interruption shall take place.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought I had your consent. I beg pardon.

Mr. HOAR. A person who is undertaking to state briefly a connected argument in five or ten minutes, which was all I was doing, is fairly entitled to finish his own statement before any courtesy compels him to drop that and reply to the questions of half a dozen other Senators: What do you think of this? What do you think of that, and what do you say to that? I shall be happy to yield to the honorable Senator from Vermont, or the honorable Senators from Mississippi, or Illinois, or any other Senator if I can, but I should like to complete my own statement first if I may. The questions absolutely drive the argument out of my head.

I was saying that we find this unfortunate condition of things existing, and practically it will be impossible to do any considerable good to those communities in this way unless the bill goes so far as to say that the two races having established this system down there we will not regard their action in that particular as an objection to their receiving the benefits of the bill. Then the Senator from Vermont says, but why not go further and establish by national authority in the distribution of this fund in the State itself a difference in right and in lawful privilege based upon race; because the proposition of the Senator from Vermont in the first place takes these people, separating them by reason of race, and then declares that the races shall be compared with one another in the matter of illiteracy and the distribution made in that way. If the suggestion were to take each school district without regard to whether the children are white or black, each school, and give to that particular school the benefit of this fund in proportion to the ignorance of the children it contained we should avoid this particular objection. But I do not suppose any Senator would seriously press that proposition on the attention of the Senate, because the result would be that the whole national aid for education must only go practically to children who were beginners.

The bill goes upon the ground that if you have a school system which is giving a common-school education to all the children of a State, it shall, in proportion to the particular need of the State, eke out the State provision for that purpose; and that is all.

Mr. ALLISON. In order that this question may be thoroughly presented to the Senate, I desire to offer an amendment which I have had on my table some days respecting it, to come in at the end of section 2. I think I can convince the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators that this is not a proposition to divide the money upon race, but a proposition to divide it upon the principle of the bill, which is illiteracy; and that if this money is to be given upon the basis of illiteracy, that basis should run through the bill. If we have colored children who are more illiterate than white children in a State, the principle of the bill as well as the principle of exact justice requires that the donation given by the Government shall be to that particular portion of the people who are illiterate, whether they be white or black. I merely offer the amendment now that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be printed. It is not now in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I know that it is not in order at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money paid in such State shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bears to each other as shown by such census.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts in opposing the idea of equality in this distribution between the colored and white children in States where the State law makes a discrimination as it regards the methods and places of education says that if you have a family, which is his case, of a father and mother and seven children, it is no part of our mission in giving some money to help them keep from starving to inquire into the respective conditions of the children of that family, and we must assume that the father and mother will treat all the children alike. That is very fair and very right; but when the father and mother come to us for this donation and say to us, "We have a law in our family which says that out of our seven children four of them, who are colored (and three of them are white), shall be fed in separate rooms and shall sleep in separate beds and live in separate houses," then I think it would be fair for the giver of all good and perfect gifts out of the Treasury to say, "If you have got a law of that kind in your family, as we want to help all your children, we will provide that this bread and butter and beef, &c., to the extent of 25 per cent. that is necessary, shall be divided according to your law of separation of your family; and that the four colored children of yours, who live in a separate house and sleep in a separate bed and are taught in a separate school, shall have the four-sevenths of this money that we give, and your white children shall have the three-sevenths."

That is the argument, and that is my answer to it; and that is exactly this case. The Congress of the United States does not propose, at least so far as I am concerned, to create any distinctions between races, but in making this donation of money it proposes to recognize distinctions and separations that the respective States have chosen in their own wisdom to make. I make no quarrel with that distinction. I am inclined to believe, differing from the Senator from Massachusetts, that under existing conditions of affairs it is better for the children of both races and for the ultimate good of those respective States that they should at present be educated separately. I think it is better for them all, as it strikes me.

Therefore the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, instead of creating distinctions, assumes and takes up the very distinction that the laws of these States make themselves and creates no new one. It says simply that wherever that rule of separation and inclusion and exclusion exists, there and then, and so far and no farther, shall the application of this money be made to the two respective classes in proportion to the numbers of those classes and the numbers of those schools. Is that interfering with the rights of the States? Is that making race distinctions, or color distinctions, or any other distinctions? It takes the case as it finds it. In applies this gift in exactly the way the State has chosen to apply its own gifts and donations and contributions and taxations of public money for the support of these schools. Is not that right? That is all there is to it.

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts has seemed to think, differing from his friend from New Hampshire, that this bill does not do that thing. But the bill does say in section 3 that this provision in regard to education, without any discrimination of race or color, shall not be construed to interfere with the separation of the races that the States may make in their schools, as follows:

Provided, That separate schools for white and colored children shall not be considered a violation of this condition.

The condition being that there shall be education out of this fund without distinction of race or color.

Then the bill provides that it recognizes, and admits, and submits to, in the giving of this gift, the right of each State to do what many of the States have done, to institute separate schools for their white and their colored children. When such a State makes such a distinction by its laws, and it turns out that in that State there are three colored children needing education to one white, it is not right that this gift, if it is to be devoted to the purpose we all say it is, of helping them all alike, should be applied in the same proportion, in accordance with the State law which makes that distinction, and therefore place this bread of life, as it is, of political and moral and social life, and I might almost say of spiritual life, on the plates and tables of the people who need it according to the State separations and institutions that each State has made for itself. That is the proposition.

Take the State of Vermont for illustration, where to be sure there is no such thing as separate education between the white and colored children. There are very few colored people there, but they all go to the schools with their little white friends, there being no objection anywhere among children that ever I have seen to playing marbles or playing ball or anything in the streets between white and colored; and therefore in our State there is no objection to their receiving the same bounties and being taught in the same way. I am not criticising other States where there are greater numbers of these people, if that were to make any difference; I am saying nothing about that. The proposition is not to allow the State of Vermont to take this fund upon the theory of general illiteracy and then authorize her to give one-half of it to one race and one-half of it to the other, when of one race there are nine to ten that need it to one in the other.

If the State of Vermont chooses to say that her white and colored children shall be educated separately, and when the statistics show that in the State of Vermont there are four colored children to one white that are illiterate, or four colored persons on the basis of this bill, then apply the money according to that need, in conformity with the institution of the State itself, in order that all may fare alike out of this gift, and not leave it to the discretion and the temptation of any State to unjustly and unduly distribute this money as the political or other social bias may be in one State or another, according as one race or the other may have the preponderance of political power. That is my proposition.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Vermont in replying to the illustration which I put of the family seems to me not to understand as I do the bill itself. Now, the proposition is this: This bill comes in and says in the first instance, in order to get this money you must have a school system provided by your laws for all the children and making an equal provision for all, which is the common-school system of which we speak. In other words, the only separation is not a separation in school privileges, for that cuts off the right of the State to the bounty of the bill altogether, but only a separation in the place where these school privileges are held. The family with the three white children and the four colored children dining at the separate table or living in the separate room is first required to be able, with the addition of this fund which we supply, amply to provide food equal alike for all. That is in the bill; that is secured. That, therefore, answers the last suggestion of my honorable friend from Vermont, where he says that if they have nine colored children in Vermont in a certain town and only one white, the State of Vermont shall not give the one more than it gives to the other nine. That is all provided for and settled and fixed.

The criticism that is made on the bill is that when you find out the extent of the national bounty by finding out the illiteracy or the needs of each State, when you have got the unit of the school system, to wit, the State, you do not go further and say that the particular sum of money which comes from the national Treasury shall be traced into white or colored schools in proportion to the amount of the inability to read and write of the children in each. In the first place, there is no necessity for that; the whole thing is secured without it. In the next place, it is very objectionable, because there you have implanted for the first and only time in national legislation a provision that this money is to go in a certain way to people, to be sure in proportion to their illiteracy but because of a distinction of race. It is introducing this objectionable feature, and without the slightest reason or the slightest advantage to be gained from it.

Then there is another reason which seems to me absolutely fatal to the proposition of the honorable Senator from Vermont. Suppose you have got in a common-school system two sets of schools side by side. In one they are teaching the A B C and the writing of ordinary English words; in the other they are a little further advanced and are studying arithmetic, geography, and history, which come I think within the definition of common-school education in this bill. The State, having been compelled, in the first place, to give equal advantages to all those children, so that they have got a school where the whole thing is taught, and taught to everybody as he comes, is required by the honorable Senator from Vermont to go further and to say that whereas in your school system one set of children has got a little beyond the census test of being able to write their names, you have got a graded school in the city of Richmond, in the city of Boston, or anywhere else, and you must take all the money which you are putting into the general school fund, and under which the State was maintaining both those schools, and give it to the school simply where the children can not write their names. Now, what is the use of that proposition?

Mr. EDMUNDS (in his seat). That is not my proposition at all.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator tell me why it is not his proposition?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not want to interrupt the Senator, although I did make that remark privately to him. My proposition is exactly the proposition that the Senator from Iowa has stated in his amendment, that this distribution between white and colored schools does not depend upon the state of education in those particular schools, but it depends upon precisely what the bill says as to the distribution to the States, and that is according to the illiteracy of the white and colored races in the State, on the scheme of the bill, of ten years of age and upward; and therefore the state of education in a graded school, or in a common school, or in an intermediate school does not touch the question at all.

Mr. HOAR. Then you have got two towns side by side in each of which there are a hundred children at school, and in one of them the hundred children who are at school have not learned to write or have not learned to read before they left home. They require the simplest, cheapest, and easiest kind of education. In the next town, the children being of wealthier parents, have got a step forward, and they go into the public schools for the first time able to read the English language and to write their names. Now, the Senator from Vermont says that the State which is required to furnish the schooling needed for both, and which is eking out in doing it its own funds, all except this provision, shall take this particular sum and pour it into the treasury of one town to the exclusion of the treasury of the other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not said anything of the kind.

Mr. HOAR. If that is done, the result will follow that the States ought to be permitted to make a distinction. If you are educating every child in Mississippi, and the State of Mississippi has a school fund that is supplied by Congress, or from public lands or anywhere else, four-fifths of which goes to educate black children in proportion to their illiteracy, and only one-fifth goes to educate white, although the white children are as numerous as the black—take the State of Louisiana, where the two races are about equal—does it not follow, and ought it not to follow, that if the black children are provided for chiefly or amply from the national Treasury the State should be permitted to put its white children on an equality by making a larger provision for its own; and thus you have built up, necessarily built up, inequalities in the school system, inequalities of education, inequalities of administration, inequalities of application between the two races.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to present a privileged report.

The report was read, as follows:

1,000 copies unbound	$373 85

	12,020 55

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress on Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States, 31,000 copies; of which 10,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 20,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 copies for the use of the Department of State, and 500 copies shall be for the use of Mrs. Eliza E. Hendricks; and the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have printed a portrait of the said Thomas A. Hendricks to accompany said eulogies, and for the purpose of engraving and printing said portrait the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 124) to print 31,000 copies of the eulogies on Thomas A Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. HEWITT. I ask unanimous consent to present at this time, and have printed in the RECORD, a memorial of savings-banks of the State of New York, 122 in number, representing 1,165,000 depositors, in reference to the suspension of the coinage of silver. The memorial is not long. I do not ask to have the names printed.

There being no objection, the following memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, representatives of the savings-banks of the State of New York, respectfully submit that they hold in trust for over 1,165,000 persons their savings, averaging about $375 for each depositor, aggregating the sum of over $437,000,000, and that all the funds and property of the said savings banks and all their earnings and accumulations belong exclusively to their depositors, chiefly industrious persons of small means, and that your petitioners have no interest therein except as custodians for said depositors. As such representatives we respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to repeal the law which directs the coinage of the 412½-grain silver dollars.

We heartily agree with the opinions expressed upon this subject by the President of the United States in his recent message, and we pray that it may please Congress to enact that the said coinage be discontinued, for the reason, among many others of weight, that its continuance, unregulated by the demands of trade or by the ability of the circulation to absorb it, tends to sever our currency from the gold standard, to compromise the national credit, and to create distrust in the minds of the people.

To make our securities, principal and interest, payable in silver dollars, and thereby reduce the exchange value of the savings of the people by 20 per cent., would be a loss of purchasing power of the funds in the savings-banks of New York State alone equivalent to a shrinkage in value of nearly $100,000,000; and that, as the value of the currency would be alike impaired, whether in savings banks or elsewhere, this vast sum would represent only a small portion of that loss to be apprehended from the continued compulsory coinage of the standard silver dollars, the greater portion of which loss must be borne by the industrial classes whose interest we serve.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now proceed to call the standing and select committees for reports.

R. 3271) to repeal certain laws relating to permanent and indefinite appropriations. The object of the committee in asking that this communication be printed and recommitted is that the House may be in full possession of the information which is before the committee.

Mr. BLAND. Would it be in order to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this bill contains any provision for the repeal of any portion of the existing law in regard to the silver question?

Mr. RANDALL. It has no relation to that subject.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the communication will be ordered to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. RANDALL. Permit me to say that this document embraces the opinions of the heads of the different Departments in relation to the propriety of repealing certain appropriations which are known as permanent and indefinite appropriations. The Mint appropriation would be among these. I did not at first understand the gentleman's question. This document is now presented merely for the information of the House; we are not asking any action upon the proposition.

Mr. BLAND. I thought it best that attention should be called to the fact.

There being no objection it was ordered accordingly.

By unanimous consent House bill 2905 was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COWLES. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry. Yesterday, while the House had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits and when the bill was on its passage, I demanded the yeas and nays. The proceedings as reported in the RECORD this morning show that fact. Usually I speak so as to be heard in this Hall, and it is evident I spoke sufficiently loud yesterday for the Official Reporter to hear me distinctly. Members in different parts of the House also heard my demand for the yeas and nays. Now, I wish to know whether there is any way in which my colleagues and myself can place ourselves on record on the passage of that measure?

I make no reflection, of course, upon the honorable gentleman who occupied the chair on yesterday in your stead, my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. He did not hear me make the demand for the yeas and nays. I can only speak; I can not make him hear.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know of any method by which the gentleman from North Carolina can place upon record the fact that he was opposed to this bill except by the mere statement which the gentleman has now made.

Mr. STORM. I recollect distinctly standing quite near the gentleman from North Carolina and heard his colleague call for a division, and immediately afterward the gentleman himself demanded the yeas and nays. I was near, and remember it distinctly.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that when a division was called for on the passage of that bill nearly every member in the House, as it appeared, rose to his feet, and I was proceeding to count and had gotten as far in the count as the middle aisle, when there was a general cry all over the House, "no further count demanded." I thereupon stopped counting and asked the question, "Is further count insisted upon?" and waited for some little time for a response. There being no response, I thereupon announced that no further count being insisted upon, the bill is passed. It seems that during this announcement the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES] called for the yeas and nays. I did not hear the demand, or it certainly should have been recognized, because I am especially careful when occupying the chair to allow gentlemen to have every latitude in the way of division, tellers, or by the yeas and nays. I regret very much the fact that I did not hear the demand, and only the more regret it because gentlemen desired to make a record on this bill.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that I called for a division on the passage of the bill, and my colleague [Mr. COWLES] demanded the yeas and nays, which demand was not heard.

The question was taken on a division on the demand made, and while the count was progressing some gentleman cried out, "no further count demanded." Then my colleague called for the yeas and nays, as the RECORD shows. He desired the yeas and nays upon the bill in order to go upon the record in opposition to it.

Mr. BRUMM. I would like to add that on this side of the House the demand was heard by a number of gentlemen right around me—the demand for the yeas and nays—immediately following the call for a division.

The SPEAKER. There seems to be no controversy about the fact that the demand was made.

Mr. BRUMM. I thought it well that it should be understood the demand was heard on this side of the House.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 4387) for the relief of Mrs. Josephine D. Hellyer; which was ordered to be laid on the table, and the accompanying report printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. MATSON, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3910) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth Ward, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MURPHY. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for the consideration of bills. The hour begins at five minutes before 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that after this hour I propose to call up the pension appropriation bill for consideration.

Mr. MURPHY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

ILLINOIS AND MISSISSIPPI RIVER CANAL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5869) to provide for the acceptance by the United States of the proposed grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and all its appurtenances, from the State of Illinois, and for the construction of the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] is entitled to the floor for five minutes remaining of the hour begun on yesterday. [See page ——.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I have thought it best to read as a part of my remarks the report of the committee, feeling confident that it will perhaps accomplish more good than any remarks I could make in the time occupied by the reading. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Railways and Canals, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3022) to provide for the acceptance by the United States of the proposed grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and all its appurtenances, and for the construction of the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, beg leave to submit the following report:

The Illinois and Michigan Canal extends from Chicago and the waters of Lake Michigan southwesterly to the city of La Salle, a distance of 96 miles, and there connects with the Illinois River Improvement. This canal was built by the State of Illinois, aided by grant of lands from the United States, and has been in successful operation since its completion in 1847. It is 60 feet wide at water-line, with a water depth of 6 feet. The total cost of the work was $6,557,681.50. It has been the practice of the State to operate the canal on the policy of low tolls, and yet its net receipts over operating expenses amounts to $2,993,691.74.

By an act of the Legislature of Illinois, approved April 28, 1882, "the Illinois and Michigan Canal, its right of way and all its appurtenances, and all rights, titles, and interest which the State has in any real estate ceded to the State by the United States for canal purposes," was ceded to the United States upon the express condition that the grant should be accepted within five years, and that thereafter the said canal should be maintained as a national water way for commercial purposes, to be used by all persons without discrimination, under such rules and regulations as Congress may prescribe. This act was ratified by a large majority of the voters of the State, at the election of November 7, 1882.

The proposed canal from Hennepin, on the Illinois River, to the Mississippi, is designated as the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, and is known as the "Hennepin Canal." It has been surveyed by authority of the Forty-seventh Congress, under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the United States engineers report "a perfectly feasible route" for a canal 80 feet wide at the water-line, with 7 feet of water. When completed direct water communication will be secured between the Great Lakes and the water ways of the East to the Mississippi River on the west and the Gulf of Mexico on the south. The length of the line from Hennepin to the Mississippi at the mouth of Rock River is 74.5 miles. A feeder 37.1 miles in length is to be built extending to Dixon, on Rock River, and called the Rock Island route. Major Benyaurd, in his report, says of the dimensions of canal and locks:

"It is proposed to make the canal and feeder 80 feet wide on the water surface, and 7 feet deep, with slopes of 1 on 1½. The locks for the main canal are 170 feet long and 30 feet wide. These latter dimensions were adopted after considering the question of low-water navigation on the Upper Mississippi, as affecting barge transportation. The hull measurement of the larger size barges adapted to the passage of the locks is, according to the custom-house authorities, about 300 tons, though with deeper water afforded by higher stages of the river, and also by the proposed dimensions of the canal, such barges can, with the box-top, carry over 600 tons; but we had to be governed by the minimum draught of the boats at the most unfavorable stage of the main river.

"The same lock dimensions for the Hennepin Canal were also adopted by Colonel Macomb in the report of 1874, in connection with the subject of transportation routes to the sea-board."

The estimated cost of constructing this canal and feeder, including right of way, is $6,672,880.67; the estimated cost of enlarging the Illinois and Michigan Canal, $2,298,919.15; total, $8,971,809.82. This estimate is for the construction of what is known as the Rock Island route, which is recommended by the committee.

The propo ition in the bill is to accept of the proffered grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal made by the State of Illinois on the terms proposed, and to construct, under the direction of the Secretary of War, the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal (called the Hennepin), thus connecting the great water systems of the East and West.

Your committee deems it necessary to enter more fully into a description of the proposed canal in this report, but would respectfully call the attention of the House to considerations in favor of the passage of the bill.

WHY THE BILL SHOULD BE PASSED.

The four great departments of industry which give employment to our people are agriculture, mining, manufactures, and commerce, and that it is the duty of the Government to promote and protect each of these branches by wise and appropriate legislation is acknowledged by all, and it must be conceded that the cost of transportation is a factor of the highest importance, not only to these industries, but, as we hope to show, to the whole country.

In discussing this question it must be borne in mind that the agricultural districts, which furnish a surplus of wheat, corn, oats, and barley, lie west of the Alleghanies, and for the most part these cereals are produced in the great valleys of the Mississippi and Missouri and their tributaries. The distance, then, that these products of the farm must be transported to find a market is very great, whether that market be furnished by the more sterile Eastern portion of our own country or abroad, whether in New England or Great Britain. It is, moreover, apparent that to the producer every dollar of the cost of transportation he is obliged to pay in reaching a market which might have been saved is a burden laid upon him without a compensation, and for which there is no justification. A farmer who declines to adopt such improvements as will enable him to produce a crop of corn or wheat at the least possible cost will soon find himself distanced in the race for success. This is equally true of a Government to which is intrusted the legislation necessary to insure the cheapest modes of marketing the products of the soil. In this active and intelligent age the laggard nation is left behind.

Railway rates on wheat mount up to from 12 to 15 cents per bushel between Chicago and New York as soon as lake navigation ceases, while in summer it is scarcely half the higher figure. The proportionate charge by rail for the transit of a bushel of wheat between Chicago and Buffalo would be in the winter from 6 to 8 cents, while by lake it is generally 2 cents, and often less than that. The freight on a bushel of wheat between Saint Paul and Chicago is from 12 to 15 cents, while Major Benyaurd has shown that by the Mississippi and the Hennepin Canal it would not exceed 6 cents. Now, why this difference? We answer that it is owing to the existence of the great lakes and of the Erie Canal, a free water way on which heavy articles can be carried at less cost than is possible by railways, and with which pooling and combination to maintain prices is impossible.

Take another illustration, furnished in the transportation of anthracite coal. This fuel is wanted for consumption in almost every city and village in the great Northwest, and if the rates of transportation were reduced, as would be the case if the Hennepin Canal was in operation, the market for this mine product would be increased many fold. This coal is now taken from Erie, Pa., and from Buffalo to Chicago for 60 cents per ton, while the railways west from Chicago charge $2 per ton freight from that city to the Mississippi River.

Now, if this canal was in operation freight on this coal would not exceed 50 cents per ton, thereby saving $1.50 per ton over present railroad rates, and the saving on salt, iron, nails, oil, glass, paints, and all heavy merchandise would be equally great.

Not alone in grain and coal will the construction of this water connection between the two great national water systems of the country prove beneficial to both producers and consumers, but it is believed that it will prove a substantial blessing to every manufacturer and employé in all New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. In short, it will be the great reducer and regulator of freight rates from the Missouri and Mississippi to the seacoast. It will enable the manufacturer to obtain a larger and a better market and the producer a higher price—a benefit to all.

Is further argument necessary to convince the most skeptical that the construction of this canal, thus forming a link that will connect the great Mississippi River with the lakes, thereby furnishing an all-water route to the commerce of the East and the produce of the West and Northwest, is urgently demanded? As it may be asked what relief would that afford, we answer, what relief do the lakes, the Erie Canal, and the Hudson River afford? Let us see: All-water rates on grain from Chicago to Buffalo, a distance of 1,000 miles, are often but 1½ cents per bushel, and contracts have been made from Chicago to New York, including transfer charges, for 6 cents per bushel. Hence, is not the conclusion inevitable that if the Hennepin Canal is built and an all-water communication furnished from all points on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers to the lakes the present freight charges will be reduced more than 50 per cent.?

The railroads are charging from the Mississippi and Missouri Valleys to Chicago from 12 to 15 cents per bushel. Now, if this canal was constructed, wheat would be carried by water at from 3 to 5 cents per bushel from corresponding points, which would be a saving over present railroad rates of from 8 to 10 cents per bushel; and the saving would be equally great on oats, corn, and other products. But suppose the saving to be only 5 cents per bushel over present railroad rates, there would be a saving amounting to millions of dollars annually, which would be left in the pockets of the people, and not find its way into the pockets of railroad magnates. It is thus clearly seen that the saving, over present railroad rates, in one year would widen and deepen the Michigan and Illinois Canal and construct this canal over and over again.

Your committee, in giving this question that careful thought and consideration which it merits, is not unmindful of the fact that this question of interstate commerce has been agitated by the public and on the floors of Congress for years, in the vain hope that some relief would be furnished the people by reduction in transportation rates, and we are sorry to say that so far no practical good has resulted; hence we think it would be an act of wisdom on the part of this Congress if it would improve and extend our water communications, and thereby furnish a little practical relief.

Your attention is called to a communication on this subject, addressed to the Legislature of New York by that distinguished statesman, ex-Governor Seymour. He says:

* * * "A false and mischievous idea has grown up in our country that Europe depends upon us for food. This is not true. They can get all they want from many parts of the world; from India, South America, and Australia. In South America vast herds of cattle are killed merely for their hides. The carcasses are left to decay. Great Britain, which buys more of our provisions than any other country, is building railroads in Northen India to cheapen transportation, and in sending farming tools into that region to improve its agriculture. This policy has been followed by a great increase in its production of grain. Within a few years the exports of wheat from India have grown up to many millions of bushels. The governments of Europe are trying to lessen our exports as they give us such heavy balances against them. For this reason, Germany and France shut out our pork, and other governments show great uneasiness, as we disturb their relationship to their people. Our only course is to undersell other countries; as labor is higher here than elsewhere, we must depend upon smaller charges for carrying. That region is fast becoming one of our strong competitors.

"We only sell to Europe because we have cheaper modes of sending our products to their markets. We have been able to do this because we have cut down the cost of carrying. Our exports grow up as carrying rates are cut down. Railroads have always followed lower rates upon water routes, but the last are the cheapest, as is shown by the table of rates in the report on commerce and navigation of the General Government. Our agricultural interests are the most important of all. When water routes are closed by winter, railroad rates go up; when they are opened in spring, rail rates go down. * * * We are now able, if we are wise, to overcome the greater cost of production in our country, owing to our higher wages, by our cheaper transportation. We are to have a hard struggle to keep our lead as a food-supplying country, and we must give up the delusion that Europe depends upon us for food. It will only buy of us if we can deliver it to them at the lowest cost. The delusion that the Old World depends upon us for food stimulates extravagance in Congress and corruption in Legislatures. If we fail to uphold our water routes as protection against unjust and unwise charges for transportation, we shall suffer in the future."

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The question of interstate commerce and of cheapening transportation has engaged the attention of the whole country for years. This agitation led the Senate in the last Congress to appoint a committee of able and experienced Senators, who have recently reported the results of their investigations in an able paper. A careful examination of that report fully discloses the difficulties that lie in the way of so controlling railways as to permit of no injustice being done to the people or to these corporations.

The aggregate capital of the railway corporations of the United States is believed to be over $8,000,000,000. Their affairs are conducted by the best business talent the country affords; they have before them the very natural object of making their investments pay, and although these corporations are in all respects amenable to the State and National Governments which created them, yet they have rights that must be respected, and they have interests that must be protected; for the whole country has shared, and must continue to share, in the benefits and blessings of our unequaled extent of railway facilities; but conceding all this does not justify the conclusion that the Government, by whose authority these corporations have life, should place in their hands the exclusive inland carrying trade of the country. Railway rates should be regulated in the interests of the people, and your committee are of the opinion that free water transportation is well calculated to secure that end. On this point the testimony taken by the Select Committee of the Senate on Interstate Commerce is so conclusive, and applies with such force to the proposed Hennepin Canal, that your committee insert their conclusions in this report:

THE EFFECT OF WATER COMPETITION UPON RAILROAD CHARGES.

"The evidence before the committee accords with the experience of all nations in recognizing the water routes as the most effective cheapeners and regulators of railway charges. Their influence is not confined within the limits of the territory immediately accessible to water communication, but extends and controls railroad rates at such remote and interior points as have competing lines reaching means of transport by water. Competition between railroads sooner or later leads to combination or consolidation, but neither can prevail to secure unreasonable rates in the face of direct competition with free natural or artificial water routes.

"The conclusion of the committee is, therefore, that natural or artificial channels of communication by water, when favorably located, adequately improved, and properly maintained, afford the cheapest method of long distance transportation now known, and that they must continue to exercise in the future, as they have invariably exercised in the past, an absolutely controlling and beneficially regulating influence upon the charges made upon any and all other means of transit."

WHEAT AND CORN.

As per official estimate the crop of wheat for the year 1884 in the Upper Mississippi States was 188,349,000 bushels, and of corn, for the same year, 837,574,000 bushels, making a total of 1,025,923,000 bushels of these two staples. Now, it is well known that the market value of this vast amount of grain is determined by the price that can be obtained abroad for so much of it as seeks a foreign market. The cost of production and the cost of transportation has nothing whatever to do in determining the price. It is not, then, perfectly clear that whatever is saved in the cost of transportation is an absolute gain to the producer, and, therefore, a failure to secure any possible saving in the transportation lays a burden unnecessarily upon the producing farmers of the West.

To more definitely show the immense saving which would be effected by the construction of the proposed canal, your committee would again call attention to the amount of wheat and corn produced in the States of the Upper Mississippi Valley in 1884, as above stated, showing a total of 1,025,923,000 bushels. Now, suppose one-half is shipped eastward for consumption and for export, and the saving is only 2 cents per bushel, it reaches over $10,000,000 in a single year, whereas, as is believed, the saving is equal to at least 5 cents per bushel, and you have the fabulous sum of over $25,000,000 annually, to say nothing of the saving on heavy articles going West, which would amount to many millions more.

THE EFFECT OF FREE WATER TRANSPORTATION ON RAILWAYS.

Your committee are unwilling to admit that cheapening transportation on heavy articles, thus benefiting the people, will result in damage to the great railway interests of the country; on the contrary we believe that whatever is for the general good will, in the end, prove beneficial to our railways.

We do not desire to antagonize the railways, which have done so much to develop the country generally, and the great West in particular. The place these public corporations have to fill is to serve the purpose of rapid transit for passengers and mails, and such freighting as can bear the charges imposed without inflicting a loss on the consumer or producer that is burdensome, but in the matter of all heavy freights not requiring special speed, it is now demonstrated that our extended national water ways must be brought into use. Missing links like the Hennepin Canal must be constructed and the crippled industries of our country must thereby be restored to a condition of health and prosperity.

NATIONAL CHARACTER OF THE WORK.

Your committee would point to the important fact that when the Illinois and Michigan Canal becomes a national work, and the "Hennepin" a part of the same, then will there be a great public water way connecting Chicago with Saint Louis and New Orleans, on which fleets of barges towed by steam will ply and connect these three great cities of the West.

The sugar, rice, and cotton of the delta of the Lower Mississippi and the valuable lumber of Alabama, Arkansas, and Tennessee will have another outlet at rates which will leave the producer a fair margin, while the produce and manufactured articles from the North will find their way to the consumers of the South at living rates of freight.

When, as it is hoped in the near future will be the fact, we have either a canal cut through the Isthmus, or a way provided for carrying over it our merchant vessels as they ply between New Orleans and the various sea-ports of our neighbor republics of South America, laden with the interchangeable products of the Northern and Southern hemispheres of the American continent, then our city of New Orleans should be, and we hope will be, in readiness to become the great metropolis of the South as New York is of the East, and will be equipped with a water course permeating every part of our great Mississippi Valley, ay, and through the great lakes to the Gulf of Saint Lawrence.

EFFECT ON OUR EXPORT TRADE.

Your committee would be unfaithful to the interests of this great internal improvement if they failed to call the attention of the House to the intimate connection that exists between our export of cereals, especially of wheat, and cheap transportation. The States of Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Minnesota, Kansas, and Nebraska, all lying westward from Chicago, are large wheat-producing States. For many years the surplus wheat and flour of the United States have found a market in Great Britain, but it has already transpired that we are severly menaced with competitors for this great market, a fact that demands our serious attention.

Our shipments of cereals to foreign markets have gradually fallen off. In 1880 our exports of these commodities amounted to 288,000,000 bushels and decreased from year to year until in 1885 the shipments had fallen to 162,000,000, being a decrease of 126,000,000 in five years. During the same period there has been a constant increase in wheat shipments to the English markets from Australia, Russia, and India. The increase in exports of wheat from the latter country have been most remarkable. In 1872 the first experimental cargo came to Liverpool from India. In 1875 she sent only 1,500,000 of bushels; in 1882, 37,000,000, and last year India shipped to England over 60,000,000 of bushels.

WHAT ENGLAND IS DOING IN INDIA.

How comes it to pass that the shipments of wheat from India have increased so enormously? The answer is that the English Government has expended large amounts of money, over $100,000,000, to cheapen the transportation of wheat from inland India to the seaboard, and thus the production of wheat, which before was without a market, has been largely increased. What, then, is the duty of the American Congress? Shall we yield the contest for a market without a struggle? Shall we not rather begin now to improve our natural water courses and to construct such connecting links as the Hennepin Canal, to the end that the remote portions of our great country may be brought as near as possible to the sea by cheap freights, and thus maintain a foreign market for our surplus?

The period will doubtless come in our country when, with a largely increased population and a diversified industry, all of our tillable soil will be required to produce the breadstuffs we shall then need for home consumption; but time enough must elapse before we reach that point to justify a determined effort on our part to maintain for our surplus cereals that foreign market we have so long enjoyed. Suppose we fail in this, and as a consequence the balance of trade turns against the United States; will any one contend that financial disaster and commercial ruin would not be the result? If we would avert the dire consequences that most certainly would follow such a changed condition of our foreign trade, we must see to it that our inland rates of transportation on our surplus cereals are reduced to a minimum, and your committee believe that the construction of the proposed canal would do more to accomplish that end than would be possible in any other expenditure of the same amount of money.

SHALL THE UNITED STATES BUILD THE CANAL.

But, says the objector, you may be correct in your estimate of the great importance of cheap inland transportation; it may be true that agriculture, mining, manufactures, and commerce may all be greatly benefited in the way you describe, but it is not right for the General Government to undertake to build canals within States; the States through which these public improvements may chance to be located should construct at their own cost.

When the Hennepin Canal is in operation, its benefits will be felt in every county between the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, and in Kansas and Nebraska as well. Indiana and Ohio will send their bituminous coal, and Pennsylvania her anthracite and her iron ore more cheaply to the West, and so will New England and New Jersey feel the influence of reduced rates of freight; while the Empire State, with her unrivaled metropolitan seaport, will share with Philadelphia and Baltimore in the increase and permanence of a foreign trade, which without cheap inland freight would not exist. Shall it be said that Illinois should do all this? Nay, verily. Your committee are brought to the conclusion that too much has already been done by the General Government in the improvement of our water courses to allow such an unjust policy to prevail; too many millions have already been expended on improvements not a whit more national in their character than the canal, by which it is proposed to simply remove an obstruction that nature has left in the way of connecting the waters of the Gulf of Saint Lawrence with those of the Gulf of Mexico, to justify the conclusion that any single State should construct this canal.

COMMENDATIONS AND INDORSEMENTS.

No public improvement, in the knowledge of your committee, has received the indorsement that this has. As early as the year 1845 a water convention was held at Memphis, Tenn., with Hon. John C. Calhoun, that strict constructionist of South Carolina, as presiding officer. It was represented by five hundred and fifty-three gentlemen from sixteen States, and the following resolution passed that body unanimously:

Resolved, That the project of connecting the Mississippi River with the lakes of the North by a canal, and thus with the Atlantic Ocean, is a measure worthy of the enlightened consideration of Congress."

In 1872 the President of the United States called the attention of Congress to this canal and other water improvements, and suggested the selection of a committee, with power to investigate and act. In compliance with the President's wish, the Senate selected seven out of that body, Senator William Windom, of Minnesota, being its chairman.

By referring to page 232 of the report made by that committee to the Senate you will find the following statement made:

"The freight charged by the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company is 8 cents per 100 pounds from Henry to Chicago, between which points there is water competition, while the rate to Tiskilwa, only 12 miles farther west than Henry, and beyond the effect of canal competition, is 15 cents per 100 pounds, nearly as much for 12 miles as for 100 miles."

And it is proper for your committee to state that both these points are on the proposed canal, Henry east of Hennepin and Tiskilwa west.

A further reference to that report of the Senate committee will show its indorsement and strong reasons why it should be constructed in the interest of commerce. The General Assembly of the State of Iowa did, in 1864, in 1870, in 1874, in 1880, in 1882, in 1884, and at the present session of its Legislature, memorialize Congress for the construction of this canal. Illinois, through its legislative body, has also repeatedly memorialized Congress and requested its representatives to support this improvement. The Legislature of New York has twice passed resolutions, almost unanimously, urging Congress to construct this canal, and requested its representatives to vote an appropriation therefor.

In 1884 President Arthur saw proper to call the attention of the Forty-eighth Congress by special message to the public importance of this water communication, and therein recommended its consideration.

The Forty-seventh Congress ordered a survey of said canal and appropriated $30,000 to pay the expense.

Maj. W. H. H. Benyaurd, of the Civil Engineer Corps, made said survey, and his reports and estimates are on file, and we are confident that a careful perusal of said report will satisfy the most skeptical that this canal should be built because of its worth and merit.

Every convention that has been held in the interest of Western water ways has given this canal a favorable indorsement. We will refer to a few particularly: One in Saint Louis, in 1880; one in the city of Davenport, Iowa, in 1881; one in New Orleans, in 1885, and one in Saint Paul, last September. These conventions were composed of hundreds of delegates, representing all the States in the Mississippi and Missouri Valleys, North and South, with governors, members of Congress, and United States Senators of those States, and it pleases your committee to say that after careful and general discussion all of these great bodies passed resolutions unanimously indorsing the construction of this canal, and urging Congress to make an appropriation therefor.

It has been indorsed twice by the National Board of Trade, held in Washington in July, 1884 and 1885, and by the Industrial Congress, held in Chicago in May, 1884.

In March, 1885, a select committee was appointed by the Senate to investigate and report upon the subject and regulation of transportation by railroad and water routes. By reference to pages 167 to 175 inclusive, it will be seen that that committee, after careful investigation, concluded that this water improvement was absolutely necessary in the interest of commerce, and that the General Government should, without further delay, make the necessary appropriation. The last Congress was petitioned by the leading wholesale merchants, business men, and manufacturing companies of New Haven, Meriden, Norwich, and Hartford, Conn.; of Manchester, N. H.; of Fitchburg, Worcester, Springfield, Pittsfield, North Adams, and Holyoke, Mass., and of Pittsburgh, Pa.

The commercial bodies of Chicago, Saint Paul, Minneapolis, Saint Louis, La Crosse, Duluth, Davenport, Muscatine, Rock Island, Buffalo, Syracuse, and New York have all memorialized Congress for its construction.

The New York Board of Trade and Transportation has a membership of one thousand business firms in New York city. It devotes its income and time to the consideration and decision of questions of public interest. It is not a trading body. Twice this board has indorsed the "Hennepin Canal," after careful consideration and full discussion.

Your committee would call particular attention to the language of one of these indorsements, namely, the Produce Exchange, of New York. They number three thousand members, and they never take action without careful deliberation by reference to proper committee, and then act on their report. And it must be said to their credit, they gave this canal their unanimous indorsement, which was prefaced by saying:

"That this was the first time since their organization that they had recommended the General Government to aid or construct internal improvements, or had asked or advised their Representatives in Congress to vote appropriations for any internal improvement of any kind; that this was an exception, and if they were not firmly convinced that it had merit they would not depart from their universal rule."

WOULD THE EXPENDITURE BE A PROPER ONE?

Again it may be thought that the amount required to construct the "Hennepin" and improve the present canal ($9,000,000) is too large a sum for such a locality.

Reference has already been made to the saving of $10,000,000 per annum on grain freights alone, which it is believed this great improvement will secure, and in this connection your committee beg leave to refer to the amount of internal-revenue tax collected in the last fiscal year from the States that produce so largely the cereals for which cheap transportation will be secured by building this canal:

Illinois	$23,075,864 61
Iowa	2,222,059 15
Kansas	170,202 02
Nebraska	1,971,296 12
Minnesota	492,704 97
Missouri	6,276,165 85
	34,228,292 72

It will be seen that a small per cent. of the amount thus actually paid into the United States Treasury annually by the States named would build the "Hennepin" and improve the Illinois and Michigan Canal as proposed; and it should not be forgotten that the people of these States contribute their full share to the payment of whatever of duties on imports are laid to raise the revenue and to protect the manufacturing industries of the country. These States do not come here to ask for themselves special favors, but only that which is manifestly for the interest of all sections, and to the injury of none.

The people of these States are as intelligent, as enterprising, and as fair-minded as any other, and it is not too much to say that, in the name of fair play, they insist on the construction of this great improvement.

Whenever it shall be in the future, as it has been in the past, that the great Northwest shall be called on to vote for the improvement of our harbors and rivers, or to do anything properly demanded in the interest of commerce, its Representatives will not withhold the needed aid; and your committee will not doubt but that Congress will, by the passage of this bill, accept the grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, generously offered by the State of Illinois, and construct the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, thus uniting the great water systems of the East and West and of the North and South in one grand highway for internal commerce.

Your committee therefore, in consideration of the importance of the construction of the Hennepin and Rock Island Canal, and of the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, in the interest of the great and rapidly growing commerce of the country and of the people, and especially of the Northwest, report back said House bill 3022 with a substitute, and recommend the passage of the substitute.

Mr. Chairman, is it not an admitted fact that no other country has so many great rivers and lakes, extending from the far interior to the tide water in so many directions, as ours? Great navigable channels for commerce, with comparatively few obstructions, and who says these obstructions shall not be removed, the channels opened, widened, and deepened, so that Congress can have some hope in the near future to render aid and comfort to the producer of the Northwest and furnish help and contentment to the consumer of the East, a universal blessing that all good people would take pride in? For the true object in life is happiness, and, as governments are founded solely for the benefit of the governed, why should not this Government, as a blessing to our people, improve our natural water ways, and construct artificial ones, when such action will be productive of so much good?

Yes, Mr. President, transportation by water is admitted to be the cheapest possible the world over, and we, the American people, who boast that we are correct by instinct, have made the least water improvement for navigation in the interest of commerce of any civilized nation.

For who does not know that the sum total for internal improvements in this country is utterly insignificant when compared with those of European countries of far less financial ability?

Now, in modern times civilization has but two modes of transportation—by rail and by water. Has not the Government of the United States furnished hundreds of millions of dollars to aid railways that are private corporations and under the control of persons and individuals? For we all know that this question of interstate commerce, in the blind effort to furnish a remedy by Congressional action, has so far proven abortive and done no good, that State assistance and legislative action have accomplished but little. And I am confident that when the Congress of these United States found no legal or constitutional objection to voting aid and assistance to private corporations, in the interests of the public, it ought not and will not hesitate to grant the same aid and assistance to improve our natural water ways and construct artificial ones when it is seen that necessity demands them as the only correct and certain regulators of railroad rates.

And it ought, and will, give to the commerce of the East and the producers of the West and Northwest the cheapest possible transport, which is by water.

Mr. Chairman, the construction of this canal will connect the Upper Mississippi with the great lakes, and 600 miles of that father of waters will be made available and will make navigation continuous and complete from the city of Saint Paul to the great lakes, and thence to the seaboard, a distance of 2,000 miles. You may ask, what is the inducement? What relief would that afford? I answer, what relief do the lakes, the Erie Canal, and the Hudson River afford? Why, rates on grain from the Western lake ports to Buffalo, a distance of 1,000 miles, are often but 1½ cents per bushel—it has been shipped for less—and contracts have been made from these ports to New York, including transfer charges, for 6 cents per bushel. Hence will any one doubt or dispute the statement, that if this canal is built, and an all-water communication furnished from all points of the Mississippi River to the lakes, that the present freight charges will be reduced from 50 to 75 per cent.; that instead of paying 12 to 15 cents per bushel it will be carried from 3 to 5 cents per bushel. Which saving will leave in the pockets of the producers millions that are now paid out to railroad corporations and companies; and what is true of the grain shipped East is equally true of merchandise shipped West. Take, for example, by way of illustration, the anthracite coal of Pennsylvania, which, you well know, is consumed in large quantities in the Northwest since the introduction of base-burning stoves into domestic economy. This coal is brought by water from Erie, Pa., and laid down in Chicago, a distance of over 1,000 miles, for 60 cents per ton; and you all know it costs to-day $2 per ton to transport this coal to the Mississippi River, a distance of less than 200 miles.

Now, construct this Hennepin Canal and it will not cost 50 cents per ton—thereby a saving of $1.50 per ton over present railroad rates. What is true of coal is equally true of salt, nails, oil, glass, lumber, iron, paints, and all other heavy merchandise; and equally true of Eastern shipments of all kinds of grain and farming products.

And, Mr. Chairman, I now make the statement that, by comparison and mathematical calculation, if you adopt this report, and this great water way is opened from the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers to the lakes, the surplus grain of the States of Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, there will be a saving of 6 cents per bushel over present railroad rates now charged, and 6 cents per bushel would amount to $31,326,105.50. This is no dream of fancy, for the annual board of trade for the city of Chicago, which is as follows, proves its correctness, which I now read:

4. The vast volume attained by the annual cereal product of the States directly tributary to the Upper Mississippi presents yet additional support to the plea for an all-water transportation route to the East. The annual report of the Chicago Board of Trade for 1882 estimates the crop yield thus:

	Bushels.
Illinois:
Wheat	52,302,900
Corn	187,336,900
Oats	18,696,000
Total	258,335,800
Iowa:
Wheat	25,487,200
Corn	178,487,600
Oats	99,141,000
Total	303,115,800
Kansas:
Wheat	33,248,000
Corn	150,452,600
Oats	29,700,000
Total	213,400,600
Nebraska:
Wheat	14,947,200
Corn	82,478,200
Oats	44,555,700
Total	141,981,100
Minnesota:
Wheat	37,630,500
Corn	21,127,600
Oats	9,417,650
Total	67,575,750
Wisconsin:
Wheat	20,145,400
Corn	30,201,600
Oats	12,780,800
Total	63,127,800

Thus is presented a grand total of 1,047,536,850 bushels as the product of three cereals only in a single year from six States, constituting only a part of the widely extended area certain to be affected and benefited by an extension to the Upper Mississippi of the water-route system of transportation reaching westward from New York, but now having its western terminus at Chicago. But consideration of these facts would be seriously incomplete were it not made to include the fact that, vast as are the aggregates of productions in the States named for the year 1882, they are certain to be yet largely increased year by year. Comparative statistics are almost startling in that regard. Thus, as a single illustration where many might be given, the wheat product of Iowa from 1849 to 1860, as shown by carefully compiled statistics, aggregated 50,000,000 bushels; from 1860 to 1870, 195,000,000; from 1870 to 1881, 375,000,000 bushels. Of corn the yield was, from 1849 to 1860, 250,000,000; from 1860 to 1870, 550,000,000; and from 1870 to 1881, 1,800,000,000 bushels. Estimating the wheat at 85 cents per bushel and the corn at 35 cents, a curious statistician has recently shown (see Clinton Iowa Agriculturist, February 2, 1883) that the total value of these two crops in Iowa, excluding those of 1882, would equal $1,177,000,000, or more than the highest estimate of the value of all the gold product of California from its discovery on June 19, 1848, to June 30, 1881.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, it is admitted and can not be denied but that cheaper transportation is absolutely necessary if we intend to find a market abroad for our surplus products. For it is a maxim in commercial law that man will buy where he can buy the cheapest and sell where he can sell the dearest, and as experience shows that water routes are the cheapest, why should not we improve our natural water routes and construct artificial ones, when, like the Erie Canal and this canal, they only form connecting links? And I refer in this connection to the following statement by Mr. Horatio Seymour, jr. He says:

Experience shows that water routes are the cheapest for many kinds of transportation, as will be made clear by the following statement:

Average rate per bushel of grain.

Year.	Chicago to Liverpool.			New York to Liverpool.

It will be seen from the foregoing statement that the average difference in an all-rail route of transport from Chicago to New York of grain since 1868 to 1882 is a saving of 9¾ cents per bushel on the average by an all-water route over an all-rail route. And this saving on the amount we shipped abroad in 1880, which was 288,000,000 bushels, as given by official statement, would be two millions eight hundred and odd thousand dollars. And as our foreign shipments are only about one-half that is transported from the West to the East we can correctly calculate on at least $2,000,000 more saved by an all-water transport for home consumption. That would make $4,800,000 saved by water transportation over rail routes from Chicago to New York in one year, and if the saving on Western shipments was an equal sum, that would be a saving of $9,600,000; and in this connection I wish to call your attention to the reports of the leading trunk lines, collated by Mr. Joseph Nimmo, jr., in a table illustrating the successive reduction of freight charges on those roads and on the Erie Canal, respectively, which furnish striking evidence on this point. I read from Internal Commerce of the United States for 1880, appendix, page 230:

Of twelve of the railroads therein enumerated, maintaining an average freight charge of from 1.85 to 3.168 cents per ton per mile, respectively, in 1868, the only ones maintaining for the year 1880 an average freight charge of .88 of a cent per ton per mile were those having no water-route competition. This is a summary of that exhibit as to the charges for 1880 per ton per mile:

RAILROADS HAVING COMPETITION IN WATER ROUTES.

	Per ton per mile.
New York Central Railroad	$0 00.88
Pennsylvania Railroad	00.88
New York, Erie and Western Railroad	00.84
Philadelphia and Erie Railroad	00.56
Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad	00.75
Michigan Central Railroad	00.842
Pittsburgh and Fort Wayne Railroad (for 1879, for 1880 not given)	00.76

RAILROADS NOT COMPELLED TO MEET WATER-ROUTE COMPETITION.

	Per ton per mile.
Boston and Albany Railroad	$0 01.20
Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad (for 1879, for 1880 not given)	01.023
Chicago and Northwestern Railroad (for 1879, for 1880 not given)	01.49
Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railroad (for 1879, for 1880 not given)	01.76
Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad (for 1879, for 1880 not given)	01.21
Erie Canal rate for 1880	0 00.49

Thus it will be seen that the four leading trunk railroads running to Chicago from the Upper Mississippi Valley States maintained an average of .63 of a cent per ton per mile freight charge in excess of the average freight charge of seven other trunk railroads eastward of Chicago, where tariff rates were, as Mr. Fink has explained, constantly under the control of the potentially operative competition of the water routes of the lakes and the Erie Canal. The fact thus cited to attention is a very important one. Its existence is urged as furnishing an argument for the opening up of an extension of the water route of the lakes to the Upper Mississippi so strong that its force can neither be moderated nor escaped.

Is any more argument necessary? Will any more be required to support the proposition that if the Government of the United States will do its duty to the people and construct this canal the people of the Northwest can save 50 per cent. over present rates of transportation, and 50 per cent. would amount to over $10,000,000 annually? And when you add to that a corresponding saving of 50 per cent. to the Eastern people on their manufactured goods and other products, that would be a saving of $10,000,000 to them, making an annual saving over present rates of $20,000,000. Thus it can be seen with the naked eye that the saving over present railroad rates in one year would build the canal three times. Hence, in the light of the foregoing, will any gentleman on this floor contend for a moment that this internal (not, as it is sometimes termed, "infernal") improvement is not worthy, meritorious, and necessary? This is no local matter, for cheap transportation benefits the consumers and producers alike. It is true the farmers are more urgent in demanding these improvements, because cheap transportation is indispensable to foreign markets for their surplus grain. And is there any question more seriously agitated by the public to-day, or of so much importance as to guard with zealous care the agricultural interests?

For you all know it has been the greatest factor in the commercial prosperity of this nation, and will continue to be, if right and justice is done. You may ask what special rights the farmer has over any other class for consideration. I will answer: They have all the right which the furnishing of 80 per cent. of all our exports during the last sixty years can give them, and they have the further right—they furnish the production from whence comes our internal revenue.

So, you see, all the other interests combined export only one-fifth as much as the farmers, and any one of them has received five times as much care, aid, and protection from this Government. Will this continue? If we act wisely it will not, but if we act unwisely, and fail to do our duty by constructing this canal and improving all our water ways, thereby increasing our facilities and reducing the present cost of carriage, we will find that our producing rivals, Russia, Australia, and India, will supply the Liverpool market instead of the United States of America. For if that market takes its supply from these nations, our surplus will be a burden; and, believe me, this is no dream of fancy, for a casual investigation will show the situation and danger.

Will any one deny that it is a maxim of commercial law "that man will buy where he can buy the cheapest, and sell where he can sell the dearest?" And hence, is it not a mathematical conclusion that the saving of 5 to 10 cents per bushel on our hundreds of millions of surplus, in its carriage, would find a demand that if not saved it would not? And is it not wise and just to protect our farmers, and let them enjoy in the future, the same as in the past, the sunshine and comfort that $200,000,000 will furnish from the sale of these surplus products abroad? For if we have a foreign market, that is the amount we will receive.

Yes, my friends, investigation tells us that we have to-day formidable competitors in the Liverpool markets, and their growth and strength increases daily. We learn that India, one of our competitors, sent her first trial cargo to Liverpool in 1872. In 1875 she sent 1,500,000 bushels of grain. She kept on increasing yearly until in 1882 she shipped over 37,000,000 bushels of wheat; which increase has continued until last year she shipped 74,000,000 bushels, being three-fourths as much as the United States exported in 1880. Now, I ask in all candor, is not this conclusive that this competition is real, substantial, and permanent?

Supply and demand is the arbitrary rule that fixes prices, not by force of imagination or supposition, but by mathematical calculation. And remember there is no protection, low or high tariff, to aid or assist our honest farmers in finding a market for their surplus products.

But it is said canals are played out, and this age and generation are too progressive; that we have not time to give them thought or consideration; and I fully realize that before you can convince you must be heard, and you can not be heard without attention. And while I am satisfied that all things have their day and generation, do we not believe in resurrection and reform? And how often do we find reform absolutely necessary in all departments of life, for we have ups and downs in life the same as "puts and calls."

Yes, Mr. Chairman, history tells us that during the latter half of the eighteenth century there was a greater rage for canals than for railroads. In the third quarter of this—the nineteenth—century it was the reverse, and I am of the opinion that the latter part of this century will ever be famous for the canals constructed.

In England and Wales they have 4,332 miles of inland water ways, of which 2,919 are canals, and the total cost is estimated at $100,000,000.

Russia has 900 miles of canal, which, in most instances, unite headwaters of rivers that have their outlets at opposite extremities of the continent.

Sweden abounds in lakes which cover 14,000 square miles, with no navigable rivers except those which have been made so by internal improvements and canals. Sweden has nevertheless great internal navigation, her lakes, rivers, and bays being connected by over 300 miles of canals. There is direct water communication between the Baltic Sea and Gothenburg, and the distance from Stockholm to Gothenburg is 370 miles—one 50-mile canal, and the same distance along the Baltic; the balance of 270 miles is through lakes, bays, and rivers, and thus made made navigable.

Germany had in 1878 1,250 miles of canals, 70 in number, which are being increased annually.

Holland has 930 miles of canals and 340 miles of river navigation. The North Holland Canal, 52 miles long and 16 feet deep, is the greatest work of its day. It was constructed from 1819 to 1825 at a cost of $4,500,000.

France has the Canal du Mede, which unites the Atlantic with the Mediterranean and Bordeaux with Cette. The celebrated canal of Languedoc was built from 1667 to 1681—two hundred years ago. It is 171 miles in length and 5 feet 3 inches deep. It seems France has 8,120 miles of inland water transportation—by river, 4,997 miles, and canal, 3,123 miles. Actual cost of these canals, $163,690,715; for river improvements, $67,785,152, being a total, up to 1872, of $231,475,867 expended by France for internal improvements; and in the face of this, in 1878 the estimated cost of canals and other internal improvements yet to be completed and constructed, $200,000,000 more. Hence it will be seen that France, with a standing army of over five hundred thousand men, three hundred and two ships of war, and fifty thousand marines, at an annual cost of $115,000,000, a public debt of four and three-quarter billions, almost double the amount which our national debt ever was, and a population of only 37,000,000, has expended on her water ways double what we have. And now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to contrast the action and expenditure of France for cheap water transportation with the United States, for an examination will tell us that our Government has only expended for all kinds of internal improvements since its foundation the small sum of $111,000,000; and out of this sum canals have only had a trifle over $10,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, shall the nations of the Old World teach us the duties of the hour? Are we willing to yield the proud position of leader in the world's proud march of progress to which we have been called by the god of nature?

This nation of ours, administered by the people and for the people, should not rest until our national water ways that are navigable are made perfect and complete by water connections like this canal.

Yes, this canal is demanded by every reason which should influence statesmen to legislate for the good of the people.

Will any one deny that the industry of our country is paralyzed for the want of money which lies locked up in the Treasury, and if paid out only on Government bonds will not aid or assist the commercial interests of our country or find bread and meat to the poor and needy who are willing to work early and late to keep gaunt want and wretched poverty from darkening their firesides? Yes, Mr. Chairman, we will do our duty and pay out, I hope, millions of dollars that are now rusting in the Treasury for this and other much needed public works, which action will result in a blessing to our people whose representatives we are, and thereby warm the firesides and gladden the hearts of thousands of our fellow-citizens by giving them employment and thereby put bread into the mouths of their suffering families.

And in this connection I wish to call the particular attention of this House to a question asked by our friend BLANCHARD, from Louisiana, and the reply thereto of Hon. J. C. Dore, of Chicago, when before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors at this session of Congress.

Mr. BLANCHARD said: "Would it not be proper to say, if we were to take one-half of what it costs France, England, or Germany to maintain their standing armies—such armies as we do not maintain—and put that in improvements, it would accomplish a great deal of good?"

Mr. Dore, answering, said: "Inferentially I am on the same line. The United States has no such burden. It is a common saying that we have no navy, and our Army is little more than sufficient for a national police; and yet, forsooth, with an immense annual surplus of revenue, how many of our legislators will say this great nation of sixty millions of people, and having now fifty billions of dollars of wealth, can not afford to spend $25,000,000 annually on internal improvements? If we intend to compete with other nations in the markets of the world we must adopt the same means to insure success, if we can not do better. If we do not, we shall not deserve success and will continue to be beaten as we are now."

And, gentlemen on this floor, are we ready to yield the proud position of leader in the world's grand march of progress? Are we willing to allow our foreign market to be taken from us and captured by foreign rivals?

Mr. Chairman, I have no interest in this subject, except the interest I take in all things that concern the honor and welfare of my country and its prosperity. We are to have a hard struggle to keep our lead as a food-supplying country, and we must give up the delusion that Europe depends upon us for food, for it will only buy of us if we can deliver at the lowest cost. The delusion that the Old World depends upon us for food stimulates extravagance in Congress and corruption in legislatures. If we fail to uphold our water routes as protection against unwise and unjust charges for transportation, we will suffer in the future. Yes, Mr. Chairman, it is estimated that the United States can produce to-day enough to supply 100,000,000 of people, while our consumption is for 50,000,000, so that we have a surplus of 100 per cent. What is to be done with this surplus if we can not compete and find a market abroad? Must it not rot in the storehouse? And in this connection I wish to call your close attention to a vital fact, and upon which rests our future prosperity, and that fact is a self-evident truth. If we have a market where we can take and sell our surplus products we will prosper, but if we have not we will not. To provide a market for our surplus is the question, for in my judgment our want in the near future is a market for our products.

To-day our want is supplied by a foreign demand, but who is bold enough to assume that it will continue with the sharp competition of rival nations that are to the front to-day? In that competition we can only hope to be successful by a cheaper transportation to the seaboard. Hence it is that the united producing interests of this country demand with one voice that Congress shall make the necessary appropriations to improve our natural water ways and construct artificial ones, when they form a connecting link, like the Hennepin Canal, to the end that our prosperity in the past will be enjoyed in the future, for without a market our surplus would be a burden; and remember, you never miss the water till the well runs dry. And, Mr. Chairman, I say how we are to provide, keep, and hold a market for what we have to sell is one of the most important subjects that can command the attention and respect of American statesmanship, for good statesmanship will not only provide for the present, but, if wise, will look into the future. So I may say that the construction of this water way by the General Government is needed and demanded, and that demand is voiced by the merchants and manufacturers of the East, seconded by the consumers of western products, and echoed back by ten millions of the producers of the Northwest, who have sweat and toiled, early and late, in the useless effort to contend by labor and patient toil against the unjust charges and willful extortions of railroads.

And, Mr. Chairman, in this statement I am but echoing the refined wisdom of that distinguished statesman, President Monroe, who in his first message to Congress said. I quote:

> When we consider the vast extent of territory in the United States, the great amount and value of its productions, the connection of its parts, and other circumstances on which their prosperity and happiness depend, we can not fail to entertain a high sense of the advantage to be derived from the facility which may be afforded in the intercourse between them by means of good roads and canals. Never did a country of such vast extent offer equal inducements to improvements of this kind, nor ever were consequences of such magnitude involved in them.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, they are of great magnitude. Now, take this link in water connection—the Hennepin Canal—which connects the Mississippi River and its tributaries and our great inland lakes. Look at the map attentively; study it carefully. The now called Michigan and Mississippi Canal will carry freight from the Mississippi River to Lake Michigan at Chicago, and from thence the lakes will carry it to Buffalo, thence by the Erie Canal and the Hudson River to New York city, and from New York city by water around the world.

And, Mr. Chairman, if a single doubt rests in the mind of any gentleman on this floor I feel confident it will be removed when his attention is called to an article published in the New York Herald, prepared by that well-known writer on water ways, Col. Alexander D. Anderson, of New Orleans. He says:

> Of the hundreds of streams which comprise the Mississippi River system forty-three are navigable, and either intersect or border twenty-one of the forty-seven States and Territories.
> These twenty-one States and Territories contain 51 per cent. of the nation's area and 58 per cent. of the population.
> The heads of navigation of the respective rivers are designated by cross marks on the accompanying diagram.
> The total mileage of the forty-three rivers is 15,640.
> The mileage of navigation attaching to each of the twenty-one States and Territories is approximated as follows:

Arkansas	2,100	Indian Territory	720
Missouri	1,870	Minnesota	660
Louisiana	1,650	Wisconsin	560
Mississippi	1,380	Ohio	550
Montana	1,310	Texas	440
Dakota	1,280	Nebraska	400
Illinois	1,270	West Virginia	390
Tennessee	1,260	Pennsylvania	380
Kentucky	1,230	Kansas	240
Indiana	840	Alabama	200
Iowa	830

PRODUCTS OF STATES INTERSECTED.

> The above-mentioned twenty-one States and Territories, which are either intersected or bordered by the navigable portions of the Mississippi and its tributaries, produced during the last census year 98 per cent. of the sugar, 94 per cent. of the coal, 89 per cent. of the corn, 81 per cent. of the pig-iron, 76 per cent. of the oats, 74 per cent. of the wheat, 68 per cent. of the cotton, 65 per cent. of the tobacco, 60 per cent. of the hay, 57 per cent. of the forest products, 56 per cent. of the wool; and contained 82 per cent. of the swine, 77 per cent. of the mules, 74 per cent. of the horses, and 73 per cent. of the cattle, other than working oxen and milch cows.

Their total grain product during the last census year was as follows, in bushels:

Indian corn	1,558,358,656
Wheat	342,230,515
Oats	310,271,709
Barley	18,868,089
Rye	13,947,824
Buckwheat	5,082,580
Total	2,248,779,373

In other words, the States and Territories tapped by the navigable portions of the Mississippi River system produced grain to the extent of 44 bushels for every man, woman, and child, as enumerated in the census of 1880. They are, then, not only the granary of the nation, but of the world.

And, Mr. Chairman, it is with pride as well as pleasure I take this opportunity of saying that our esteemed friend, Colonel Anderson, could not and did not forget to mention this canal improvement, and I now read his concluding statement:

In addition to this grand showing for the mighty Mississippi, the Michigan and Mississippi Canal, 74½ miles long, will connect this great river water-way system with our inland lakes—over 2,000 more more miles of water-way—it will cost the people of the United States only $5,000,000 to build it entire, and it will save to the people in return each year, on freight, not less than $50,000,000. And the Dixon Sun with heart and soul says, Let Congress, for the people, build it, and build it promptly!

Mr. Chairman, I ask in all candor if there ever was a canal constructed by the hand of man upon God's "green earth" that formed a link by its construction, and thus connected navigable waters, that did not prove worthy and meritorious? Hence is it rash to conclude that if you will build this canal its benefits to commerce are guaranteed and certain? Take for example and by way of illustration its twin sister, the Saint Mary's Falls Canal, which connects two great waters of the lakes. It was constructed by a donation of Government land, like many railroads constructed by the same aid, and is to-day a private corporation. And be it said to the honor and manliness of the people of that section they are praying to have Congress make an appropriation and purchase it, so that it will be a free water route, and then they will not be burdened by its toll charges. That canal was constructed and put in operation in 1855, and the following table will show its increase in transportation in twenty years; and allow me to say this is no Munchausen dream, for I was furnished this statement by the Civil Engineers Department a few days since:

Tonnage carried through Saint Mary's Falls Canal; registered tonnage used to 1880 inclusive, freight tonnage since.

1855	100,000	1871	750,000
1856	100,000	1872	920,000
1857	180,000	1873	1,200,000
1858	225,000	1874	1,060,000
1859	350,000	1875	1,260,000
1860	400,000	1876	1,540,000
1861	280,000	1877	1,440,000
1862	360,000	1878	1,660,000
1863	510,000	1879	1,680,000
1864	570,000	1880	1,740,000
1865	420,000	1881	1,560,000
1866	460,000	1882	2,080,000
1867	560,000	1883	2,260,000
1868	440,000	1884	2,870,000
1869	525,000	1885	3,200,000
1870	680,000

This tonnage, if oats, would be 208,750,000 bushels; if corn, would be 116,428,571⅔ bushels; if wheat, would be 108,666,666⅔ bushels.

Mr. Chairman, the report or our Committee on Railways and Canals that I have read in my opening remarks shows conclusively that no water improvement of any kind, no matter where located, has received the indorsement that this one has. But as the Produce Exchange of New York is one of the largest and oldest commercial bodies of this country I wish to call particular attention to their action and memorial.

To the board of managers of the New York Produce Exchange:

Your committee on trade, to whom has been referred the question of application to Congress for the building of the Hennepin Canal by the United States, have given to this subject the attention demanded by its important bearing on the internal commerce of the country, and respectfully report as follows:

In the opinion of your committee there can be little, if any, question that the proposed opening of a water way from the Mississippi River to the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the great lakes promises highly advantageous results not only to the Northwest States but to the whole northern country east of the Mississippi River. Besides furnishing new means of transport to the Atlantic seaboard for the produce of Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, and other grain-producing States, such a canal would also act as a welcome regulator of railroad freights in the Northwest.

There can be little question, also, that neither private enterprise nor the State of Illinois, within whose territory the canal would be situate, nor any other State directly benefited, nor all these combined, will or can undertake an enterprise which is sure to meet the determined opposition of the railroad interest.

The question before us therefore simply is: Shall the United States build and maintain this canal, and can this exchange, in view of the well-grounded opposition to the policy of internal improvements in general, consistently recommend such action on the part of the General Government?

After mature consideration your committee have come to the conclusion that this question should receive an affirmative answer from your board, and for the following reasons:

The ground on which the Hennepin Canal is to be built has been repeatedly surveyed with a view to that improvement by the United States Government and by other competent parties. The practicability of the project has been established and the cost has been reliably ascertained. The scheme therefore can not be classed with a large number of internal improvements annually brought before Congress, which are indefinite in their scope and in the results expected, and of uncertain cost.

The Hennepin Canal further differs from many of those proposed improvements in so far as it is sure to benefit a very large section of the country, our own State included. The General Government, further seems to be committed to an extensive improvement of the Mississippi River, of which the Hennepin Canal may justly be considered part and parcel; and the fact that its construction would inure to the benefit of the Northern States east of the Rocky Mountains only strengthens its claim on the whole country, which for a long time to come is, according to the policy already adopted, to be taxed to the improvement of the Mississippi River in its southerly course. Your committee therefore feel justified in recommending to your board the adoption of the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas the completion of a water way from the Mississippi River to Lake Michigan by the construction of the Hennepin Canal promises to realize advantages of national importance; and

Whereas there are insuperable obstacles in the way of having such improvement carried out by private enterprise or by the States immediately benefited; and

Whereas the building of the Hennepin Canal may justly be regarded as part of the improvement of the Mississippi River: Therefore,

Resolved, That in the opinion of the New York Produce Exchange the United States Government should undertake to build the Hennepin Canal and to maintain the same free for all time to come.

And further resolved, That our Senators and Representatives be requested to join the Representatives of other States in providing the necessary legislation for carrying out this plan.

NEW YORK, December 19, 1881.

Mr. Chairman, I fear I have committed waste upon your patience, and my only apology is my zeal and earnestness. I have long since been impressed with the importance of this canal project; that impression has grown into a conviction; and in conclusion I thank you most sincerely for your indulgence and beg of members on this floor to vote for this bill, for our Government in the past has shown a genius for improvement aided by many practical ideas, an indomitable industry that has electrified the world. Will she now sit idly by and allow natural commerce, that by right of legitimacy belongs to her, to be lost by inaction? If she does, that monument of honor and glory which proudly stands in this city, and was erected by the hand of progress, will crumble into dust and return to mother earth that bore it.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any danger of overestimating the importance of this transportation question. My friend on the right asks me if I meant to say there was no danger of the passage of this bill. If I thought there was no chance for its passage I would not waste breath in talking about it to the House.

To my mind upon the wise solution of this question of transporting freight throughout the United States depends the future prosperity of this country. If there was any possibility of turning a question of this character into a partisan one by which votes could be lost or won, then there would not be any question of the attention of this House to the discussion upon this bill, every man's ears would be open and every man seeking to understand the question involved. But because this is purely a business question affecting the pockets and the prosperity of the people, out of which by no possibility can grow partisan politics, we become indifferent and drift apart, and so cast our votes upon the final issue without a real understanding of the merits of the case.

Our railroad system, the wonder growth of the nineteenth century, has opened up the great wilderness of the United States. It has peopled this vast country with the freest and most intelligent people the world knows anything about. It has brought into neighborly intercourse the people on opposite sides of the continent. It is breaking down the barriers of provincial civilization and molding us into a homogeneous people. But with this system which has done so much for the United States and for all the world, with this miracle-working system have come those evils which always go hand in hand with the greatest good. I never knew in all my personal observation or in my reading a blessing to be conferred upon humanity without finding right by the side of it a curse; and the business of legislation is to minimize the evil and get the most out of the good. Competition in most instances between railways alone has proved a failure as a safe regulator of charges.

The facility for combination and the skill of railway management have been too strong to permit the benefits expected in this direction.

Railroads are in the very necessity of the case monopolies. You can not make anything else out of them. The cost of construction, the immense consolidation of capital necessary to build a long line of road, makes a pre-emption of the country through which it goes not only possible but necessary. Legislation thus far has proved without effect in the way of controlling this monopoly and preventing it from having its natural growth—the natural growth of the power of consolidated wealth, the natural growth of the power arising from the pre-emption of any particular section of the country and the absolute control of the commerce and trade and traffic that pass across it.

While I do not despair of beneficial results from legislation yet to be had, I am quite sure we must seek it in other channels than those now advocated before any real relief will be had.

One solution and one only thus far has presented itself to the American people. Wherever water transportation has been made effective it has solved the whole question of cheap transportation and has been worth volumes of statutes upon that question. Wherever railroads have been obliged to compete for traffic with water routes this question has always settled itself.

Chicago has become the metropolis of the great West because located at the lower end of Lake Michigan, with a complete water course through the great lakes and the Erie Canal to the Atlantic seaboard. It has been able to gather in the great grain crops of the Northwest, in order that they might obtain the advantages of water competition thence to the markets of the East and the Old World. All over the Western country freights take the shortest routes to Chicago. You do not need legislation to control the railway traffic from thence to the Atlantic.

The lakes and the canal control whenever the summer months melt out the ice and allow competition between the water ways and the railways; and we get the benefit of it largely in the winter as well as in the summer. Because of the fact that the lines of railway extending eastward from Chicago and paralleling those lines farther north and farther south—because those roads have to compete in the summer, they are compelled to study cheaper methods of transportation, they are compelled to economize, to straighten out their lines, to make smaller grades, and to do all those things that wise men may do to enable them to compete with the lake routes and still make dividends for their stockholders. And so in the winter, where the water ways are ice-bound, we get the benefit of that economy; we get the benefit of the study of the railway men to make profits and to cheapen railway transportation. So all through the West we have the unparalleled low rates of transportation from Chicago, and the only trouble is when you get beyond and out of the line of water-route competition.

Now, the proposition of this bill is simply to extend Lake Michigan 500 miles westward to Saint Paul. That is the whole of it. When you figure it all down, when you strip it of all outside issues, and get away from the multitude of figures that only confuse the mind, the simple question for this House to pass upon is whether it is worthy of the attention of the United States and of the American Congress to consider the question of moving Lake Michigan 500 miles into the interior and penetrating the very heart of the great wheat fields of the Northwest. That is all there is of it. You build a canal almost straight from the southern end of Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River, and then for 400 miles more you pass up with good transportation to Saint Paul. There you are in the center of another railway system that brings there the great grain crops of all the Northwestern country.

It is 500 miles more of water competition—I will not say transportation, for I believe—and I propose to deal with all questions fairly—I believe that in the future the great body of the crops of the West moving eastward and the products of the East moving westward will be transported by rail as they are to-day. To my mind, it does not make any difference whether there is only one canal-boat a day passing over that canal, or whether there are a thousand, any more than it makes any difference whether Lake Michigan is whitened with the sails of commerce or whether the sight of a schooner is only occasionally presented to us there. So long as the lakes exist, so long as the Erie Canal is open, just so long will the price of freighting eastward be very largely controlled by the cost of freighting around by the water ways. And the same is true of Saint Paul and all the tributary country along the line between Saint Paul and Chicago. So long as you have this cheap canal across from the lake to the river, and so long as you have the Mississippi open for barge and steamboat transportation to Saint Paul, just so long will it be impossible for those who control any other method of transportation to charge much more than the cost by the water way. Therefore if you build this canal it becomes the regulator of railroad rates 500 miles farther westward into the very heart of that country which supplies the East and the Old World with bread; it necessarily cheapens the cost of that transportation, and if it does that it adds something to the profit of the farmer, it takes off something from the cost to the consumer, and all the people, producers and consumers alike, are benefited by the lessened cost of producing and carrying to market. It may be said that this is a State enterprise, and that Illinois ought to build this canal. We know, as matter of history, that New York built the Erie Canal, and because New York built that canal we may be told on this floor that Illinois ought to build this canal to the Mississippi. I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the circumstances in the two cases are entirely different.

The Erie Canal was built before the days of railroads. I remember, when a boy, emigrating to the Western country, passing across the whole State of New York upon the Erie Canal, and I never lost the impression that I received then of the magnitude of the great West from seeing the tremendous amount of commerce that was passing over that canal at that time. When the Erie Canal was built all Western New York, as well as the farther West, was shut out from market. Its building brought the richest part of the State of New York into a condition to be settled up and made productive, but it did more than that. It directed the commerce of all the great West down to New York city and made that city the commercial metropolis of the New World.

But, Mr. Chairman, suppose that canal did not exist, and this House were asked to build a canal across the State of New York, I ask gentlemen upon this floor, in view of all that canal has done, and all that it is doing, in the way of cheapening traffic between the East and the West, could there be any reason offered here against its construction except that it would take some money out of the Treasury? Who of us would consent that the project should be abandoned? Who that represents the great State of New York upon this floor would for a moment consent that that great water way, which conveys the commerce of the West down to the seaboard at New York city, should be closed up, even if the Congress of the United States had to be called upon to appropriate money to keep it open? It does not need, as I have already said, that all this commerce, or even the most of it, shall go by the canal; it does not need that the railways shall cease to carry the great bulk of that commerce; it simply needs that there shall be in existence a water way on which boats can float; then, because of the existence of that water way, the railroads must conform their charges to the rates established by its competition.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it is within your memory and mine—it is only a few years ago—that the railways of Illinois traversing that State parallel with the line of the Illinois River and Canal put their freights down so low that the canal could not pay expenses; the purpose being to close it up and force its abandonment so that it should no longer compete with them. Immediately the Legislature of the State appropriated a certain sum of money to keep up that canal. Every year from that time such an appropriation has been made, but not one dollar of it has ever been called for or used in keeping up the canal, because when the power of the State was found to be behind it there was no railroad company so foolish as to suppose that it could be broken down by competition, and thenceforward they have been satisfied to take such reasonable rates as water competition has compelled them to accept.

Mr. Chairman, I have no more interest in this canal than any other member upon this floor. No portion of my district is within 80 miles of it; no portion of the products of my district will ever be transported over it, unless the great Northwest shall cease to compete with us in feeding the world. This canal simply crosses the State of Illinois. We have the lakes. They influence freight all over the north half of our State, whether the roads run into Chicago or whether they do not. This canal is to do for the wheat-fields and the corn-fields of Iowa, Nebraska, and Minnesota what the lakes and the Erie Canal have done for the wheat-fields and corn-fields of Illinois. That is all there is of this canal. It is a national enterprise. If it is to the interest of New York and New England to send the products of those States into the Northwest, if it is to the interest of Pennsylvania to send her coal and her iron into the Northwest, it is also to the interest of the eastern half of this country to get the wheat, and corn, and oats, and whatever other products the rich farms of that region yield, down to the seaboard with just as little toll as possible.

There is no part of this country that will not feel the effects of such cheapening of transportation as will be effected by penetrating inland into the great wheat-fields 500 miles more. Chicago may get some special benefit by the increased business brought there. Our local labor market may be benefited, and I hope it will be; but these are only incidental advantages, which do not change the national character of the enterprise.

I can see no objection that any gentleman can raise if he admits the premises. If he admits that the building of this canal will cheapen transportation to the extent of a fraction of what is claimed by the special friends of the bill, he admits the whole case, unless he has constitutional objections to building any public improvement at the expense of the nation. I say when that is admitted that is all there is of the case.

Wherever ship-canals have been built, wherever navigable rivers come in conflict with railroad transportation, the things which I claim for this canal have taken place. Why, sir, in the discussion of the question of regulating railroad freights, when we propose to fix a certain rate we are met with the objection that wherever the railroads come into competition with the water ways they must have the privilege of cutting down their rates in order to get traffic. So it is everywhere. Take the city of Peoria, in which my colleague, Mr. WORTHINGTON, resides, the second city in the State of Illinois in population, in wealth, and in business. Why, its great distilling interests, the largest in the United States, have been built up because Peoria is in direct water communication with the Atlantic seaboard.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour within which this bill may be considered under the rule has expired, and the Committee of the Whole will rise.

Mr. ROWELL. I reserve the residue of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen has ten minutes of his time remaining.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5869) to provide for the acceptance by the United States of the proposed grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and all its appurtenances, from the State of Illinois, and for the construction of the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 150) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 3827) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Rosser, of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. 3846) to remove the disabilities of Alexander P. Stewart, of La Fayette County, Mississippi; and

A bill (H. R. 4409) to remove the disabilities of Edward G. W. Butler, of Missouri.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CRISP in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, it is perhaps proper that the report of the Committee on Appropriations, which accompanies this bill, should be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. RANDALL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, in presenting the bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year 1887, submit the following in explanation thereof:

The estimates upon which the bill is based will be found on page 149 of the Book of Estimates for 1887, and amount to $75,830,200.

The accompanying bill appropriates $75,754,200, apportioned as follows:

For the payment of pensions	$75,000,000
For fees and expenses of examining surgeons	500,000
For salaries of pension agents	72,000
For clerk-hire	150,000
For rents	20,000
For fuel	1,200
For lights	2,000
For postage, stationery, and incidentals	9,000

The amount for payment of pensions is increased over the sum appropriated for 1886, $15,828,000.

The amount for examining surgeons is the same as was given for the current year.

The salaries of pension agents is fixed by law; consequently no change is made in the amount for their compensation as compared with the sum given for 1886.

A reduction of $73,800 is made under the sum which was given for 1886 for clerk-hire, rent, fuel, lights, postage, stationery, and incidentals for agencies, in accordance with the estimates submitted and the law approved March 3, 1885 (Statutes at Large, volume 23, page 362).

No reduction is made in any item of the estimates except that for fees of examining surgeons, which is reduced $76,000, and made to conform to the sum given for 1886 for that service.

The total increase of the bill over the amounts appropriated for 1886 is $15,754,200.

The provisions of the bill are based upon existing law, and without regard to any legislation that may hereafter be enacted.

The bill contains no new legislation.

Section 4755 of the Revised Statutes provides that Navy pensions shall be paid out of the "Navy pension fund," upon an appropriation by Congress, so far as the same may be sufficient.

The naval pension fund at present amounts to $14,000,000, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, and is created under the provisions of sections 4751 and 4752 of the Revised Statutes.

The payments on account of Navy pensions during the fiscal year 1885 aggregated $850,135.84.

The compensation of pension agents is fixed by the act of June 14, 1878 (Supplement to the Revised Statutes, pages 347 and 348), by the act of July 4, 1884, and by the act of March 3, 1885 (Statutes at Large, volume 23, pages 99 and 362).

The compensation of examining surgeons is fixed at $2 for each examination by section 4 of the act of July 25, 1882 (Statutes at Large, volume 22, pages 175 and 176), and the act of March 3, 1885 (Statutes at Large, volume 23, page 362).

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. BLACK,
Commissioner of Pensions.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations has instructed me to present to this House the bill making provision for the payment of all invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

This bill, with the exception of the salaries of the clerical force employed in the Pension Office at Washington, appropriates the money to pay the allowances granted by law to all pensioners of all wars.

The committee has recommended that $75,754,200 be appropriated for the items mentioned in this bill, as follows:

For the payment of pensions	$75,000,000
For fees and expenses of examining surgeons	500,000
For salaries of pension agents	72,000
For clerk-hire	150,000
For rents	20,000
For fuel	1,200
For lights	2,000
For postage, stationery, and incidentals	9,000

This sum increases the amount appropriated at the last session for the present year $15,828,000. This increase is rendered necessary by the accelerated disposition of the immense number of claims which have for years accumulated in the Pension Office, and does not mean any actual increase in the ultimate cost of the pension-roll. In fact, the sooner the pending claims are disposed of, although for the time being the aggregate amount is swollen in size, yet economy will be accomplished, because then the clerical force and other expenses attending the adjustment of claims are proportionately decreased. The Commissioner of Pensions assures me that with the present rapid progress his office is making in the disposition of claims he expects within twelve months to finish the consideration of all of the 171,000 claims he found pending in the office when he was appointed last March. This demonstrates that the efficiency of the force in the Pension Office has greatly improved. It is far better for the claimants and the Government that applications should be disposed of as quickly as possible.

The amount for examining surgeons is the same as was given for the current year, but the estimate for the incoming year has been reduced by the committee $76,000, because it believes that the sum which was appropriated for the present year will be sufficient to pay the fees of the examining surgeons for the next year. This is the only reduction made in the estimates of the Department.

The provisions of this bill are based upon existing law and without regard to any legislation that may hereafter be enacted.

In view of the severe criticism upon the legislation of Congress concerning pensions and other claims of soldiers it is proper that I should now devote some attention to the subject.

The sum of money appropriated by this bill is large, but it should be and no doubt will be as cheerfully sanctioned by Congress and borne by the people as the expenditure of any other money out of the national Treasury.

The account with the heroes of the Revolution and their widows has been closed by death. Beginning, therefore, with the war of 1812, this bill includes the pensions allowed to all soldiers of all the wars of the Republic. It is indeed a sacred debt, it being the pecuniary compensation we acknowledge that we owe the soldier for the crippled limb or diseased constitution with which his services to his Government afflicted him. It covers what the Government promises to pay the widow for the life of her husband, the orphan for a father, and a dependent parent for a son.

It is true this bill makes a larger appropriation of the public money than any other which comes before Congress; but, sir, no appropriation is more just, and no money paid out of the Treasury accomplishes more general good than the money expended by this bill. The money thus appropriated is not hoarded up in bank vaults or taken out of the channels of commerce. It is at once put in circulation in every section of the land. A vast majority of pensioners are poor. Necessity compels them quickly to part with the price of their sufferings. Bakers, butchers, merchants, doctors, lawyers, bankers get a share of it. This money quickens trade and dispenses a degree of prosperity throughout the land.

The best use that can be made of the vast surplus in the Treasury will be to pay it out upon meritorious claims for pensions and other just dues to the soldier. Who can doubt the justice of their claims upon the liberality of the nation or estimate the value of their services. The Mexican veterans endowed this Republic with a larger domain and more wealth than resulted from the war of any other country in any age. California, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona, with all their wealth, were purchased with the blood and sufferings of the Mexican soldiers, and yet when in their poverty and old age they appeal for but a pittance of the incalculable wealth they have bestowed upon their country, and at a time when its Treasury is filled with millions it can not use, their appeal is ungratefully, yea, shamefully, disregarded.

What has been done for the Union soldier for his suffering and sacrifices during the late war? Only one-tenth of the number who enlisted have been allowed a pension. The equalization of bounties and their claims for arrears of pension remain unsettled. Not an acre of land has yet been given to him out of the public domain, although more than twenty years have elapsed since the close of the war.

Sir, some insist that danger to our financial standing is threatened by the prospect for payment of such claims of the soldiers. I do not believe it. The financial soundness of no man or nation can be injured by provisions for the payment of just debts. On the contrary such a course strengthens financial stability and increases substantial prosperity.

The money paid on the claims of soldiers is not lost to the country. We simply take it out of the Treasury, where it can do no good, and put it in circulation, where it is greatly needed.

One of the measures against which the loudest outcry is raised and the strongest prejudices are sought to be made against all pension laws is that which proposes to repeal the limitation upon arrears of pensions in claims filed since July 1, 1880. The opposition to that measure is most intense and unrelenting from the moneyed classes who received the richest benefits from the results of the late war.

Sir, I insist that the measure so clamorously assailed can be maintained upon the soundest principles of justice, and its enactment is demanded by good faith and patriotism.

What is the nature and effect of that measure? If adopted it will simply place applicants for pensions who have filed their claims since July 1, 1880, upon the same footing with those who applied before that date, and in all cases when the claim is allowed it grants arrears from the date of discharge. Why should such a discrimination be made? Why should he who filed his claim on June 30, 1880, and before receive arrears of pay extending back to the date of discharge, while pensions allowed in equally as meritorious cases filed next day and since shall only commence from date of allowance?

Why should the applicant living in this city, and who did not prepare his claim until June 30, and put it into the Pension Office a few moments before the close of the office that day, receive arrears, but the soldier living in Illinois, who prepared and put in the mail his claim on the same day, be denied the arrears, as has been held by the Government officials? If as we know in many instances a soldier able to live without a pension refrains from burdening his Government with his claim, but when old age overtakes him or poverty commences to pinch and he finds a need for the help of the Government which he helped and saved in the days of its distress, or as in other cases where the seeds of disease planted during his service have ripened into a disability which deprives him of the strength to maintain himself or family—tell me wherein lies the justice of the law which denies the soldier's right to arrears in such instances?

Sir, the answer is irresistible that the claims of all pensioners to arrears is just, and that the Government has by the act of 1879 already committed itself to the policy of paying them.

The only answer made to these inquiries is that it will cost too much money to pay the arrears. This was the sole ground of opposition to the bill equalizing the bounties of Union soldiers, and resulted in the ultimate loss of the bill passed for that purpose by both Houses of Congress. Sir, the paramount question should be not what such measures will cost, but are they just? This Government will fall from its proud height as the grandest in the world if it shall fail to be just to all classes. If it can, as it has done, afford to be just to its creditors it can afford to be just to its soldiers. In 1869 Congress passed one short bill giving the creditor a bond payable in coin worth par in specie in lieu of a bond payable in greenbacks then worth only 75 cents on the dollar, thereby granting a bounty to the bondholder to the extent of $600,000,000. This bounty, unlike that due the soldier, had not been promised to the bondholder when he loaned his money to the Government.

After thorough consideration of the data found in the Departments the highest estimate placed upon the aggregate cost of arrears of pension under the laws now on the statute-books and that proposed in the bills now pending does not exceed four hundred and eighty-three millions. Now, sir, if you should add to this the cost of equalizing the bounties of the Union soldiers the whole sum would not exceed the bounty granted to the bondholders by the law of 1869.

There were two classes who were directly instrumental in the preservation of the Union during the late war: The bondholder and the soldier. Cupidity was the motive of many of the former; patriotism was the motive of the latter. The first class loaned their money to the Government; the latter class loaned their lives. The bondholder has not only been made whole by repayment of every dollar of the principal, but he has received enormous usury or bounty, if you please. We can never make the soldier whole. We can never repay him for his loan and sacrifices. The manly form which left the side of a loving wife and the care of dependent children, and who fell defending that flag on the battlefield, can never be restored to the desolate home he left behind him. Can we ever restore the crippled limbs and shattered health of those who escaped death in the hospital or on the field? No! And yet when measures are proposed to pay what was promised the soldier at the time his help was called for those who advocate such measures are denounced as demagogues.

The young soldier whose bones whiten a Southern battlefield can never be restored to a heart-broken widowed mother who was dependent on him for protection and support.

Sir, the advocates of popular rights have in all countries and in all ages been denounced by the oppressor as a demagogue. Every noble name which this country has added to the roll of fame has been denounced as a demagogue. It is a word which, when unjustly applied, has ceased to be a stigma. Call me a demagogue if you please, but do not call me unjust or ungrateful.

The charge of demagogism, if true, should visit condemnation on him who is guilty of it; but, sir, he is a white-robed angel compared with the execrable demon of private or public ingratitude.

Let us for a few moments see how the account stands between the Government and the two classes I have mentioned, the bondholder and the soldier.

A very interesting table is appended to the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, which shows what has been paid to the bondholder for the use of the money he loaned, and what has been paid the soldier, his widow and orphans, for life, limb, and health.

It is as follows:

The Commissioner failed to add the six hundred millions donated to the bondholder by the law of 1869. But that distinguished soldier and accomplished gentleman, bearing upon his body ghastly wounds received in defending the flag, who presides over the Pension Bureau, most aptly comments on this table as follows:

It will be seen that the sum of $2,205,019,419.19 has been paid from 1862 to 1885 on the interest of the public debt, while that paid for pensions during the same period amounts only to the sum of $765,092,640.18, showing an excess of the former over the latter of $1,439,926,779.01. The citizens may well be proud of both sides of the showing and alarmed at neither.

It is well to think that the great wealth of the land is in close league with its patriotism, and that as the former volunteers now gladly contribute to the national resources, so the nation ungrudgingly bestows its pledged support to its former defenders who are now disabled.

Now permit me to quote the language of a profound thinker, one of our ablest living statesmen and one of the most trusted and trustworthy counselors of the President—the Secretary of the Interior. Hear what he says in his report in comment on this table:

I know of no burden of Government that is more cheerfully borne than that of the pension system. I concur fully in all efforts to demonstrate that it is universally regarded as a noble beneficence, and in the view that when well and cleanly administered it is noble in its purpose and good in its results, diffusing with liberal and just hand the wealth of a wealthy people among those who suffer from the strokes of war and have become impoverished by its misfortunes.

From a statement in the report of the Commissioner it appears that the amount of money paid as pensions does not equal the amount of interest paid upon the public debt incurred during the war. So long as the premium paid to those who contributed the money exceeds that paid to the defenders of the country, I think the complaint of excessive pensions is not well founded.

These gentlemen as well as all who demand justice for the soldier are classed as demagogues by many of those who received the largest gains from the sacrifices and sufferings of the soldier.

Sir, as a citizen of this grand Republic I am proud to know that it matters not what political party may administer the executive department of this Government the interest of the soldier is safe. I sincerely trust that our legislation will soon prove that the interests of all the soldiers of all the wars of the Republic can safely be intrusted to this Congress.

As I have already said, you can not make the soldier whole for his sacrifices in the time of war. This could not be done if we should pass the Mexican pension bill, the arrears-of-pension bill, the bill equalizing bounties, or the bill I have heretofore introduced granting the Union soldier a bounty-land warrant, as has been done with the soldiers of all previous wars, or even if you should do for him what practically Congress has done for the bondholder, make good the difference in value of his monthly wages, which was promised him to be paid in specie, but which he was compelled to accept in greenbacks, at times only worth 60 per cent. in specie.

Much complaint has been made by pension examining surgeons because of delay in the payment of their examining fees. This delay has been occasioned by a construction placed upon the law by the Treasury Department as far back as 1871 by Auditor Rutherford, and reaffirmed by the Treasury officials in 1878, in which it was held that "payments for pension surgeons' fees, &c., should be paid for all time due and claimed out of money appropriated for the fiscal year in which the voucher is presented and paid."

Since then the practice has been to pay the arrears due pension examining surgeons for services rendered in any previous year out of the money appropriated for the payment of fees for services rendered during the current year for which the appropriation was made. By reason, therefore, of the use of money intended for services rendered during the present current year being paid on the claims of services rendered by surgeons in the last and previous years the pay of the present surgeons has been postponed until additional appropriations are made. This decision imposes a hardship upon the present force of examining surgeons, and I do not believe it is a proper construction of the law. Section 3690 of the Revised Statutes provides that appropriations for any fiscal year "shall only be applied to the payment of expenses properly incurred during that year." I do not believe that the fees of pension examining surgeons can properly be made an exception to this statute.

In order to obviate this trouble in the future it is submitted that the better course will be to confine the appropriations of the current year to the payment of services rendered during that period, and provide for any arrears due for services in past years by a direct appropriation in the general deficiency bill. In order that this may be done I shall offer an amendment directing how the money appropriated by this bill shall be used.

At the end of line 39 insert:

And all money appropriated by this act other than for the payment of pensions shall be disbursed subject to the provisions of section 3690 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

I ask that the following tables, taken from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, may be appended to my remarks:

* For pensioners, see table of "Pensions allowed."

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am gratified indeed to note the patriotic expressions of my colleague on the subcommittee [Mr. TOWNSHEND] having charge of this bill; and I thoroughly concur with him in the main with respect to the statements he has made. There is one point, however, that he has failed to make clear to this House; I presume possibly it has escaped his notice. But the report read and the remarks made by the gentleman in charge of the bill show that there is an increase of $15,754,200 in these appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1887, and my colleague on the committee attributes this increase to the accelerated work in the Pension Office. It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to attempt to detract in the slightest degree from the good work of any officer of the Government; but I deem it my duty to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the appropriations for the last few years—since, for instance, the arrearage act of 1879; and a lesson may be drawn therefrom which may explain this matter on a different basis from the one adopted by my colleague on the committee.

In the first place the gentleman has failed to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Commissioner of Pensions stated to the Committee on Appropriations that there would be a deficiency of about $6,000,000 upon the expenditures of the current year; so that the $60,000,000 which were appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1886, are confessed by the Commissioner of Pensions to be insufficient to meet the requirements of the law.

But I desire to give one or two additional facts. What has been appropriated heretofore? For the year ending June 30, 1882, there was appropriated $65,750,000. For the year ending June 30, 1883, there was appropriated $100,307,999.18. For the year ending June 30, 1884, there was appropriated $86,295,000. For the year ending June 30, 1885, the appropriation was $76,586,846.24. For the year ending June 30, 1886, Congress appropriated $60,000,000. The present bill proposes to appropriate $75,754,200. The average appropriation for six years is $77,449,007. Hence we are $1,694,807 below the average of the last six years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the average annual appropriation for the payment of pensions for the last six years is $77,449,007, making the appropriations for this year $1,694,807 below the average appropriations of the last six years.

Mr. WILSON. Will my colleague on the committee allow me a single suggestion?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. With great pleasure.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that the gentleman is pursuing his present line of argument to show the efficiency of the working of the Pension Office, and that the appropriations made from year to year hitherto have been larger on that account than the appropriations made the present year. If the gentleman will turn to the Commissioner's report he will find a statement of the disbursements made by the office in those years, which, I submit, is a fairer test of the work of the office than the appropriations made here, which in a great many of those years simply included a reappropriation of the balance coming over from the previous fiscal year.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. My excellent friend from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], with a mind always clear and fair, only anticipates me. I had intended to come to the disbursements in the very next stage of my remarks. But I do not desire to pass from these points until I have impressed upon the committee that while prominence is given in this report and in the remaks of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the fact that there is in this bill an increase of $15,754,200 over the appropriations of last year, yet we are still $1,694,807 below the average of the last six years.

I deem this important for the reason that I find a well-considered effort on the part of gentlemen of this House to frighten the country with the idea that the appropriations for pensions are now and likely to be so tremendous that a halt should instantly be called.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend will allow me to make this suggestion: It is perhaps true the average appropriation is what he states, but does he not know the amount which was expended falls far below the average of appropriations? For instance, $40,000,000 in one year was returned to the Treasury and reappropriated. The average expenditure this year will fall far below the average of appropriations.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No, sir; but on the contrary the expenditures have never equaled the appropriations, as I will show. That was the point called out by my good friend from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Since I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations we have reappropriated $40,000,000 which had been turned back into the Treasury.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Twenty millions of dollars for the year ending June 30, 1884, but none for last year.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. For 1884. So the expenditure falls far below the average you mention.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Yes; that is what I am coming to. Now, Mr. Chairman, having touched on appropriations for this purpose, I come to the point suggested by the gentleman from West Virginia. And here is a lesson I wish every gentleman of the committee to take into consideration, that the appropriations are no guide to the cost of pensions, nor can you find from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions the true data. It can only be found from the Treasury Department. Now, the expenditures on account of pensions for the year ending June 30, 1881, were $50,059,279.62; for 1882, $61,345,193.95; for 1883, $66,012,573.64; for 1884, $55,429,228.06; and for 1885, $56,102,267.49.

The average payments and disbursements for these five years were $57,789,708.55. The last year's payments were $1,677,441.06 less than the average of the last five years. It is true, the Commissioner says, a deficiency will yet come in, although it has not been reported to the Treasury Department.

Now, then, the reason why there is an average deficiency of about $20,000,000 between the amount appropriated and the amount expended, as nearly as I can gather from the records of the Department, is, that there is a large amount in excess every year covered into the Treasury. The reason why the Pension Office does not give it (and I am not referring to it as something to the discredit of the Pension Office because you can not get the data there) is, as I understand the facts, the Pension Office charges the sums sent to the pension agencies as if expended, whereas each agency may have a large amount in excess, half a million or a million, which, if not expended at the end of every two years, must be covered back into the Treasury of the United States.

RANDALL AND BLACK FIGHTING PENSIONS.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, this is all I deem necessary to say specifically in reference to this bill. It has been shown in the report for what these appropriations are designed, and I presume you have observed the reading of the report. But, sir, in this report I also find a matter which was not read when the rest of it was read. I presume the gentleman in charge of the bill deemed it not necessary. Here is a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, giving the amount which has been paid out for arrearages under the arrearages acts of 1879. What that has to do with this particular bill I am unable to comprehend. The good judgment of the gentleman in charge of the bill did not call for the reading of this letter, from which I draw the inference that he did not deem it necessary for the purposes of this bill. But it is here in the report.

That is not all, Mr. Chairman, for the country has lately been treated to a very large amount of information in reference to arrearages. We have a letter from the present Commissioner of Pensions to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations giving estimates of what the passage of the proposition to grant arrearages to soldiers would probably cost. Why the Committee on Appropriations, or rather its able and honorable chairman, took this load on his shoulders I am not prepared to say. I can not believe it was because there was not sufficient faith in the able and patriotic Committee on Invalid Pensions, but I have watched and waited for some time for some explanation.

I find in the New York Herald of January 27 last a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The head lines are not poetic, but they are startling and are a sermon in themselves. So choice are they I will venture to read them to the committee:

Wild pension schemes—It would take every dollar in the Treasury to pay them—Over $302,000,000 in peril—A raid organized for the benefit of pension claimants—Mr. RANDALL's timely action.

Well, I am glad that we have a gentleman in this House so patriotic as to rescue this country from the danger which seemed to threaten it. Why was all this done? Why was the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions given to the country twenty-four hours in advance of any knowledge of it coming to the members of the Committee on Appropriations? Why was it that the leading Democratic journals of New York published it with such pleasant head lines before humble members of the Committee on Appropriations knew what was going on in the giant intellects of other members of that committee?

Mr. RANDALL. It did not come from the Committee on Appropriations, or from any member of the committee, or from me.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am very glad indeed to know that, Mr. Chairman. I understood that there were but two copies given out, one to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. RANDALL. And mine was not given out.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And one to the President of the United States. The gentleman from Pennsylvania disclaims it, the President of the United States is not here, and it is only a question now between "the king and the cobbler"—Commissioner Black and President Cleveland. I am glad indeed, I repeat, that the chairman of my committee shows that his skirts are clear.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow a question?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Well, I am not getting along very rapidly with my speech. There are quite a number of things that I wish to refer to, and I can not yield much more.

Mr. SOWDEN. I would like the gentleman from Iowa to tell this committee whether that letter which was published in the New York Herald was not brought to light on account of and to show the vast amount of money suppositiously involved in the amendment offered to the widows' pension bill by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not see any question to answer; but I thank the gentleman for the word "suppositious," so discretly used in his speech.

Mr. SOWDEN. But is not that the fact, that it was evolved because of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana and to show the effect of it?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I can not yield to the gentleman for a speech. I do not yield to a speech I can not hear.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word in regard to this letter. When that letter came out from Commissioner Black I examined it very carefully, and I was startled by the statement that $302,836,200 would be the result of the passage of the arrearages bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Well, I think I can not yield any further, but I will if you will be brief; I have only an hour.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know the gentleman does not wish to do any injustice to Commissioner Black. I understand the character of the letter published in the New York Herald purports to give the substance of a letter from Commissioner Black to Mr. RANDALL, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, does it not?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Oh, yes; word for word, letter for letter, in hæc verba.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And that letter was called for by the chairman of the committee. It was a request on the part of the chairman of the committee to the Commissioner of Pensions to furnish certain information to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And in regard to a bill not before the committee, and which could not come before it. That is exactly what I have stated.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Still the chairman had a right to make the inquiry so that the committee could have the information.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Undoubtedly; so, too, had every other gentleman in Congress. But it was not germane.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I simply do not want any injustice done to the chairman.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Well, Brother RANDALL can take care of himself, I suppose, in this matter.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know whether I answered the question of the gentleman in full. I understood it to relate to the manner in which the letter got out. I have answered that distinctly, that it did not come from the copy in my possession.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, I got a negative answer from you on that point. You did deny it just now.

Mr. RANDALL. And I have no knowledge of the publication whatever. As to why the letter was prompted, I have no hesitation in saying that I felt it my duty, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to inquire, with my experience here under former legislation, what was likely to be the probable amount of cost to the Government by this amendment. That I did on my own motion, unsolicited from any quarter to make the inquiry.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then I would like to ask my friend from Pennsylvania the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he has extended his field of inquiry to embrace all other subjects of legislation which are before all of the other committees of this Congress and likely to involve an increase of expenditures?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; but only with respect to that with which I am specially charged.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does the consideration of the pension bills for our poor soldiers alone have his warning care and is that the only field of investigation?

Mr. RANDALL. We had to appropriate money——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. For laws not yet made. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. And it was with a view to the proper performance of that duty that the inquiry was made.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Now let me take up this famous letter of Commissioner Black, because it has not only been telegraphed over the country, but it was telegraphed with a ninety-three-million-dollar lie in its stomach; and though I have been a pretty careful reader of the organs of the Democracy published in New York city, I have failed to see published a correction or recantation of the falsehoods that are given to the nation through those Democratic media. When I take up this letter and analyze it I see at once from the face of it that it contains a repetition or duplication of $80,468,100. In other words, that amount, as is shown in Commissioner Black's letter, on his theory, would still have to be paid under the arrearages acts of 1879. But as he included the same amount when he came to a final computation of the amount which would probably be allowed on the claims still pending should the arrearage bill pass, this amount is contained twice. In order to do him justice——

Mr. MATSON. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Unless I am assured of more time I must decline further interruptions, although there is no gentleman to whom I would more willingly yield than my friend from Indiana.

Mr. MATSON. I only wish to ask the gentleman if he is not aware that General Black published a subsequent letter soon after the other, in which he corrects his mistake.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am just coming to that. I have not seen any letter from him published. But I will state what occurred.

Not desiring to do any injustice to the Commissioner of Pensions I drew a letter, addressed to him, as carefully as I could, on the day after his letter appeared, and sent it from this House by a riding page. In that letter I said to him in substance: Have you not duplicated this $80,400,000 in your recapitulation? In other words, do you not charge to the operation of the contemplated bill to grant arrearages $80,400,000 that must be paid anyhow, whether Mr. BROWNE's amendment goes through or not?

The question was drawn as clearly as I could make it. The Commissioner was stubborn. Two days afterward I got this letter, in which he sticks to his text, and says in closing:

It is believed the sum given, $302,836,200, is approximately correct.

That letter was dated January 30.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a day or two after that we had the Commissioner before the committee, and he changed front three times. (I will say I am not used to this committee business, and if I transgress any rules or courtesies of the committee I want to be brought up with a round turn, because I do not want to do anything improper in so exceedingly proper a body.) [Laughter.] But three times he changed front, until every member of the committee agreed that the point I had taken was correct; and then he gracefully yielded. And then, after fixing the thing up, an appendix, like a tail to the first great battering-ram that was let loose on the country, was put in to take back and fix up the blunder which he refused to acknowledge in my correspondence with him.

While I am not prepared to analyze motives, it is no secret in this Chamber, Mr. Chairman, that the effect of that letter acted like magic and carried terror into other committee-rooms about this Capitol. Whether it will be finally successful in intimidating any committee from meeting the patriotic requirements of the hour remains to be seen. I myself do not believe that it will. But it is finally developed that only two hundred and twenty-two millions will be the amount resulting from the passage of the bill; and that is mere speculation by a Commissioner of Pensions who could not get it hammered into his head that he had committed a blunder that blazed out from the pages of his own letter.

That is not all. There are still thirteen millions to be deducted. For when he estimates what will be payable under the acts of 1879 he puts it on a fifteen-year basis. I credit this discovery to my able friend from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], who called my attention to it.

When he comes to compute it on the final calculation he puts it at the average of eighteen years. That would apply to those coming under the act of 1879, and makes up $13,000,000 and over that should be deducted in addition to the $80,400,000.

COST OF ARREARGE ACT.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me call the attention of this House to another fact. The whole theory of the cost of the arrearages goes upon the assumption that 60 per cent. is still to be allowed on pending pension claims. Every member of this House who has aught to do in aiding these men in getting recognition or speeding their claims knows that of the 171,000 claims now pending for invalid pensions, and the 61,582 claims for widows and old fathers and mothers, the great body of them to-day are practically in a state of rejection. They are still there. They are trying to get the evidence, but they have become practically the dregs of the claims of the last twenty years, and 60 per cent. is a wild and extravagant speculation as to what will finally be due. In my judgment $150,000,000 will more than cover all that possibly can be due and payable under the arrearages bill should it become a law; and I am as good a speculative philosopher as Commissioner Black is, and I have studied this, I believe, with as much care, and desire to get at the truth.

Now, while I am on this subject, I am going to furnish a little Democratic campaign fodder, to put it into my speech for the benefit of my Democratic friends.

Mr. RANDALL. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I should like to ask him what he figures out or believes will be the cost of the amendment as offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I have just said I do not believe it would cost over $150,000,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not hear the gentleman make the statement.

COMMISSIONER BLACK'S TRUCKLING PARTISANSHIP.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And that is speculative to some extent of course; but we have had nothing else but speculation as yet. I was saying that I proposed to furnish some Democratic campaign fodder for my friends on the other side. And we are friends. We talk out in meeting sometimes, but we like each other all the same. The Commissioner of Pensions in his last report treats the country to this delightful little paragraph, which is so rich, so dignified, and so patriotic, and gives such evidence of his non-partisan peculiarities, that I think I may be pardoned if I give the committee the benefit of it. Here on page 15 of his report he says:

> At one time the Pension Bureau was all but avowedly a political machine, filled from border to border with the uncompromising adherents of a single organization, who had for the claimant other tests than those of the law, and who required, in addition to service in the field, submission to and support of a party before pensions were granted. Not always, but often was this true; not openly, but surely were the tests applied; and the vast machinery of a professed governmental office became a party power. The enormous array of the medical boards established in every quarter was almost solidly partisan; made so not openly but surely. People of one faith filled every one of the great agencies. Examiners, trained in unscrupulous schools, traversed the land as recruiting sergeants for a party.

Ah, my gentle Commissioner, when you wrote that paragraph, realizing that you had been a gallant soldier for your country, I fear you thought you might be suspected by the political party that was elevating you to place of not being sufficiently partisan, and therefore you felt it your duty to let yourself down several degrees lower and deeper than any Department or bureau chief appointed under this administration!

Let us analyze this beautiful piece of—rhetoric, I may call it. I will not use a stronger term. [Laughter.]

In the first place the Commissioner says: "Examiners trained in unscrupulous schools traversed the land as recruiting sergeants for a party."

His own report shows that there is an average of 306 examiners in the whole United States. I am not very expert in figures unless I can take my own time, but, on a rough calculation, that would be about one examiner to each one hundred and eighty thousand of the population. What a slaughter by one examiner! What a tremendous influence he must wield over the elections throughout the country! But there is another little fact that ought to be considered in this connection, and I challenge any gentleman here to correct me if I misstate it. No member of Congress on this floor ever saw a pension examiner of his own district doing business in his district. The rules of the Pension Office, which were never set aside or suspended by that faithful chief Commissioner Dudley, did not allow a pension examiner to do business in his own Congressional district. Nay, Mr. Chairman, an examiner was not even permitted to put his foot on official business within the confines of his own State. That is the rule that Commissioner Dudley made, in order that the claimant should gain no undue advantage by having his case investigated by an examiner who could be brought under local influences where the claimant lived. No man could have stepped higher or farther outside the field of partisanship than did Commissioner Dudley when he made that regulation and enforced it.

Mr. MATSON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. MATSON. I want to ask the gentleman if the rule to which he refers was not the law—whether that rule was not established, not by Commissioner Dudley, but by the law itself?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That makes the case all the stronger. I am very glad to have that fact brought to my recollection. I remember now that that is the law, and I shall be glad if any gentleman following me will point out any violation of that law by Commissioner Dudley. In my own Congressional district, which is teeming with soldiers, not only with men who went to the war from my own State but others who have moved westward from the Eastern and the Middle States—in my own district I never saw a pension examiner that I knew by sight or by name when he entered my district.

The examiners had no power politically to aid me or to injure me, and that was the rule throughout the country. And yet this Commissioner of Pensions, perched upon a pinnacle of purity so high that even the Angel Gabriel can not see him, makes this wholesale charge against the administration of the law by his predecessor.

The Commissioner speaks, too, of the board of examiners. I am glad he mentioned them. I learned something on that subject last fall in traveling over my own State. In my city there was a board of examiners.

The chairman of that board—I will give his name—was Dr. G. M. Staples, a man who served all through the war. He was one of the most distinguished surgeons from my State; he was surgeon of a regiment, surgeon of a brigade, surgeon of a division, surgeon in charge of one wing of the army that advanced upon Atlanta. He had spent years upon this board of examiners; he knew all the difficulties soldiers had to encounter in getting up their proofs, and he knew also how to detect fellows who would try to play the sneak. He could not be fooled by any of that class, of whom there were a few in every army, that had the colic when they did not have it very badly. [Laughter.] He was a man fully qualified and equipped by training and experience to understand the needs of the soldiers, and at the same time to protect the interests of the Government. Another gentleman had been appointed upon the board from its organization, my own family physician—appointed, though, before he became such, so that I had nothing to do with his appointment.

These two experienced men were removed from the board and two young men appointed in their places—men, I concede, of character and position, of good standing and good repute, gentlemen for whom I would with pleasure become a voucher as to their character, but gentlemen who had no knowledge of the experiences of the Army such as Dr. Staples had. I remember, too, learning, when going through the district of my distinguished colleague, Colonel HEPBURN (if I may be pardoned for mentioning his name), at the town of Creston, that two men who had served in the Army were removed from the board of examiners there. One of them was a Democrat and voted for Mr. Cleveland, but he committed the heinous crime of voting also for my colleague, Mr. HEPBURN. These two gentlemen were both kicked out and inexperienced civilians put in their places.

One evening when I spoke in the city of Muscatine, in the district of my distinguished colleague [Mr. MURPHY], who can talk more Hennepin Canal into you in five minutes than any man living [laughter], I met two gentlemen who had been removed from the board, who had served through all the war, experienced surgeons, and there were then two vacancies on the board, as I was told, the Department not having been able to fill their places.

In other words, two-thirds of all the examining surgeons of this country—men of experience, the great majority of them comrades of the soldiers, equipped with knowledge and with a kindly feeling for applicants—were stricken down and men without experience put in their places, many of them civilians. And, as is suggested to me, this was done as a matter of policy. It is proclaimed in this report.

I do not wish to dwell longer upon that point, for my watch tells me that my time is flying.

Mr. CUTCHEON. How about the statement as to other tests than those of the law being applied to pensioners?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am glad my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] reminds me of that point. It is suggested in this report that these parties who filled the offices had for the claimants "other tests than those of the law." I would like to see the man living who could testify to this. The Commissioner says this was not done openly. Where did he get his information? Did he get it from some of those slimy wretches who fawn around incoming power in order that they may hold place? If so the testimony will not go far with me; and the Commissioner ought not to incorporate into his report a statement of that kind based upon the evidence of that class of sneaks. That is the only term in the English language that will describe them. If I were out on the Western prairies I would use an expletive with it. [Laughter.]

Now I have had a good deal to do with the Pension Office——

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No, my friend must excuse me; I can not yield. I have several things I want to say, and my watch is hurrying me up.

Mr. SOWDEN. I only wish to say——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I can not yield. I hope my friend will keep good-natured; Pennsylvania is all right.

When interrupted, with nothing but a kindly motive, I know, I was about to say that during all the time since 1882 that I have had business dealings with the Pension Office, under the last and the previous administration, it never once occurred to me in any verbal or written communication that it was a political machine. I never once suggested to the last Commissioner, who was an intimate friend, any political reasons for the allowance of any claim; and I do not believe that any member on this floor or any man who has held a seat here ever did so. I do not believe it would have been conducive to the health of any gentleman to enter the presence of General Dudley with a dishonorable proposition like that referred to in the report of Commissioner Black.

SOUTHERN SECTIONALISM AND DEMOCRATIC MISMANAGEMENT.

But, Mr. Chairman, I pass over that. I want to come now to another subject, the question of the cost of the passage of the arrearages bill. Gentlemen say it is going to cost too much. I compliment my friend in charge of this bill [Mr. TOWNSHEND] for his sentiments on that subject. We will pull together like good fellows side by side when we can do it. My answer on this question of cost has been partially made; but I have something more to say on that subject: That is simply and solely a question for the Committee on Ways and Means. If it is true that there is logic and justice in these claims underlying the arrearages bill, that ends the question. They are just, they are logical, and the honor of the nation is pledged to pension the soldier from the moment that the service of the country injured him.

But gentlemen tell us, "Ah, but the receipts and expenditures must be looked into." In a very able, dignified, and well-tempered speech by my distinguished friend who now occupies the chair [Mr. CRISP] attention was called, if my memory serves me right, to the fact that there would be a deficiency, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in June 30, 1887. I will admit that the Secretary so states. According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the income from all sources for the year edding June 30, 1885, was $323,690,706.38; the expenditures $305,830,970.54, showing a surplus June 30, 1885, of $17,859,735.84. As compared with the former fiscal year, notwithstanding the Government has been in the hands of a great "economical and reform party"—I love to roll that as a sweet morsel under my tongue—there has been a decrease in receipts of $24,829,163.54, and an increase of expenditures of $16,100,690.78. For the year ending June 30, 1886, it is estimated that there will be a surplus of $24,250,000. For the year ending June 30, 1887, the Secretary of the Treasury estimates there will be a deficiency of $24,589,552.34.

Now, I shall be glad if the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will watch these figures. Let no one be intimidated by them. If they prove to be true, for one I would a good deal rather let the foreign gentlemen who want to come in here and traffic in American ports and other American markets pay a little more duty, in order that we might be able to meet the just and honorable obligations of the country. [Applause.] Or I would take another step, and let gentlemen who smoke tobacco and cigars, and now and then take a little whisky and beer (and we will not stop to discuss who are and who are not paying the tax now)—I would let them continue to pay their tax rather than break our faith or fail to fulfill a single one of the pledges made by this Republic to the men who were invited in its hour of danger to put their shoulder to the wheel to save this free Government from destruction. [Applause.]

That is my policy, and I caution gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee: Gentlemen go slow in reducing taxes. First, make sure what you are about, read the reports of your Government before you go further. Make Johnny Bull pay for the privilege of coming into the rich markets of America to transact his business in competition with our home producers. We will then take care of our own people. [Applause.]

How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has ten minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I want to reserve some of my time, but there is another theme I desire to touch upon before resuming my seat. It is a subject, Mr. Chairman, I approach with reluctance and hesitation.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa a portion of my time if he desires it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his kindness. Mr. Chairman, I approach with hesitation the point to which I refer, and that is the attitude of certain members of this House to this question of pensions. I say I approach it with delicacy, because the weak spot in my nature is, I have not got a hating heart. I can knock a fellow down when I am mad, but the next minute I wish to pick him up and help him and be his friend. In aught I may now say let no member of this House misinterpret my motives or sentiments.

In the speeches of the distinguished chairman of the committee made immediately after the famous Black letter came out—or in order not to rob any gentleman of his deserts, the famous Randall-Black letter—the chairman of this committee made a speech on Friday night, (private pension bill night), a most elaborate and carefully-prepared speech, in which he took up and gave currency to the ninety-million-dollar statement of the letter just alluded to. The major premise of that speech was that those who had stepped forward to save the country in its hour of peril were entitled to receive fair pensions. That was the major premise; the minor premise was this: that he was opposed to giving $12 a month to widows, because it was an exorbitant pension. The major premise was broad and patriotic in favor of giving liberal pensions, but the minor premise stated in his view that $12 a month was too large an amount. Then his assault on the arrearages proposition was made with that breadth, force, and power of which we all know the gentleman from Georgia to be capable.

Does any one here claim that $12 a month is too much for a widow who has had her natural and legal prop taken away from her? Those who indulge in the narcotic weed spend twice that much in a month and puff it away in smoke. Yet when it is proposed to give the woman whose natural support is in the grave the sum of $12 a month it is said to be too much. I wish I could feel that these gentlemen themselves are really impressed with the fact that in reality it is an exorbitant pension. But I could not help noticing the negative vote on that bill, and I ask the Clerk to read that negative vote as a part of my remarks—I refer to the widows' pension bill increasing the pension from eight to twelve dollars a month—giving with the name the State from which the member comes.

The Clerk read as follows:

J. M. Allen, Mississippi; Ballentine, Tennessee; Burnes, Georgia; Bennett, North Carolina; Blanchard, Louisiana; Blount, Georgia; Bragg, Wisconsin; Breckinridge, Arkansas; Breckinridge, Kentucky; Cabell, Virginia; Clements, Georgia; Cowles, North Carolina; Cox, North Carolina; Crain, Texas; Crisp, Georgia; Croxton, Virginia; Culberson, Texas; Daniel, Virginia; Dargan, South Carolina; Davidson, Alabama; Davidson, Florida; Dibble, South Carolina; Dougherty, Florida; Forney, Alabama; Glass, Tennessee; Hammond, Georgia; Harris, Georgia; Hemphill, South Carolina; Henderson, North Carolina; Herbert, Alabama; Hewitt, New York; Irion, Louisiana; Johnston, North Carolina; Jones, Alabama; Laffoon, Kentucky; Lanham, Texas; Martin, Alabama; McMillen, Tennessee; McRae, Arkansas; Miller, Texas; Mills, Texas; Morgan, Mississippi; Oates, Alabama; O'Ferrall, Virginia; Peel, Arkansas; Perry, South Carolina; Reagan, Texas; Reid, North Carolina; Reese, Georgia; Richardson, Tennessee; Sadler, Alabama; Sayers, Texas; Singleton, Mississippi; Skinner, North Carolina; Stewart, Texas; St. Martin, Louisiana; Stone, Kentucky; J. M. Taylor, Tennessee; Throckmorton, Texas; Tillman, South Carolina; Trigg, Virginia; Tucker, Virginia; Turner, Georgia; Wellborn, Texas; Wheeler, Alabama.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the total noes were 66. The total Democratic noes were 66. [Applause on the Republican side.] The total Republican noes were none. [Renewed applause.] The total noes South were 64; the total noes North were 2.

I pause here to say that I have not failed to note the names of those South who voted in the affirmative, and I note some of those who have been on opposing battlefields from me. I wish, sir, that there had been more of them, in order to feed the tendency of my mind for fraternity.

There were 2 votes in the negative from the North, one Mr. HEWITT, of New York, which does not disturb me much, because he is not a standing authority on any great question. [Laughter.] There is not a scrap-book, an economic scrap-book in the land but has him as the leading authority on both sides of the tariff question. [Laughter.]

If that does not dispose of my friend from New York, the eloquent allusion of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] in charge of this bill, when he referred to hostilities coming from the money power of the country, may possibly touch his case. As for my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG], the other Northern Democrat voting against the bill, I am in a little deeper trouble.

Still his speech on that question showed that he—one of the leading Democratic chieftains of the West, and recognized as such—was unwilling to recognize a widow for the purpose of a pension unless she was married to the fellow before he got hurt or was killed. But, sir, he will not go very far as Northern authority, for the reason that a man who would make a fight against a widow and at the same time make his leading effort in this Congress to restore to the enormous pay and position that he has been restored to in this House Fitz-John Porter is not a high authority, at least in some parts of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, I am so grateful for the honorable mention of my name by the gentleman from Iowa this morning, that I ask the House unanimously to extend him unlimited time. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SOWDEN. I object.

Mr. CANNON. Can I be recognized now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has promised to recognize the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN].

Mr. RYAN. Well, if I can be recognized now, I will yield so much of my time to the gentleman from Iowa as he may require.

Mr. CANNON. That was my purpose.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will require but a few minutes.

I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Kansas who has yielded me the time, and also to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his objection. As to the gentleman from Georgia, for his motion, I assume that it is inspired from nothing but the kindliest motives, and therefore doubly thank him. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, sir, this is a significant vote. There is a great lesson to be learned from this vote. In the late campaigns in the North—I do not know how it is down South—the Republican party was charged with being a party of sectionalism, a party that waves the ensanguined garment that keeps up sectional lines. The man that will ever make that charge on a public stump in America after that sample vote closes his eyes to the truth.

THE SOUTH WAIVING THE "BLOODY SHIRT."

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Oh, yes; I have time now to answer.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do it good-naturedly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I know that.

Mr. TILLMAN. And as patriotically as the gentleman himself.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Oh, yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have a country to serve as well as he has.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Considering that the cotton States, or rather what are known as confederate States, pay about one-third of the amount derived by the Federal Government from taxation—being based on consumption on imported goods and whisky and tobacco—I say considering that the taxation of the Federal Government is based upon consumption and not upon property, and therefore while the South, or the ex-confederate States, pay about one-third of the total amount paid by the Federal Government for pensions, of which they do not get back 3 cents; considering also that $8 a month from the foundation of the Government to the present time has been deemed a sufficient pension to a widow, can the gentleman blame the Southern members for trying to restrain the necessarily large expenditures for pensions within the rule that has prevailed heretofore?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I never was more grateful for an interruption. I arraign no gentleman on this floor for his vote; but I say this in reply to the gentleman, that there is no section of this country that, before God, is under deeper and more profound obligation to pay this debt, or every dollar of their share of it, than the Southern States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Was it a day of pleasure for us when our flags were unfurled and we marched southward? Was it something we craved and desired when we turned our backs upon our homes and our faces upon death? Ah, Mr. Chairman, I speak for one. I fought for the South as well as for the North, and that my friend did not do. [Applause on the Republican side.] I laid my life at his feet as much as I did to keep a roof over my own head. And now that we can all meet here together, men who stood in serried columns against each other for four years, I think that those who cast that negative vote and those covered by the question of the gentleman are under as profound a moral and legal obligation to meet this indebtedness as we are, if not more so. And if he will follow my record on this floor he will find I have voted with you gentlemen and raised my voice to help you in your appeals to give you substantial aid. I have done it in the teeth of opposition sometimes, but never have you appealed to me for one to stand by the development of the Southern country and found me shirking the duty. I have not read this vote on the widows' bill for the purpose of stirring up bad blood in you, and I know that you can not do it with me. That is not my motive. My motive is this——

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. In a moment. My motive is this: I feel in the kindest and sincerest spirit imaginable that the time has come when sectional lines should be dropped, but when sixty-four members upon that side of the House, all from the South, said that $12 were too much to pay a widow, I say that the sectional lines were kept up and the bloody shirt was unfurled in our faces.

Mr. McMILLIN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will hear the question of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. I do not understand that the gentleman alleges that any member from the Southern States has voted against pensions.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. There are these 64 votes against pensions.

NO CONSTITTTIONAL LAW IN THE SOUTH.

A MEMBER. Against an increase of pensions.

Mr. OATES. Will you not allow us when we vote for pensions to exercise same judgment as to the amount? Or are we here as slaves, and not permitted to exercise even that privilege?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No, no; not as slaves; God knows that I want all the members on this floor to stand as equals. I concede the constitutional right. One of the oldest members on this floor, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], said in discussing the widows' bill he would exercise his constitutional rights on this floor. I concede that; but I do say another thing, and the remark of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] suggests it to my mind. I say there is more than one way of observing the Constitution and more than one way of trampling it under foot.

To-day, Mr. Chairman, the Constitution is thrown in our faces as a shield to cover an almost solid vote against that little pension bill. And yet there is hardly a Constitution of the United States to be found in the Southern States. I assert here and now as my conviction that if these gentlemen respected the Constitution as they say they would not have the control in this Chamber; if they respected the Constitution instead of ballot-box stuffing and shotguns, they would not have control of the executive of this nation. [Groans and applause.] Ay, you may groan, gentlemen, but you yourselves do know, and you boast of it, too, that you will control this Government in spite of the Constitution, and I tell you here and now in this Chamber that there are as great crimes under the forms of law committed in your section as there was when Sumter was fired on. For one, I protest against sectional control of this country, with the Constitution absolutely defied.

These are my sentiments. I say that the gauntlet was thrown in that vote against fraternal feeling. But I say to my friend here and now, that that vote shall never control one vote of mine to a sectional course. I shall vote to build up the South, for God knows it needs it, and you have felt the force and effect of war. I shall give every vote that I can for the South as I would for Iowa, and that is saying a good deal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy the attention of the committee longer. [Cries of "Go on!"] I only desire to say in closing that I sincerely trust that no gentleman, especially those who were in the ranks against me, misinterpret my feelings, for I say to you now I would rather spend eternity in hell with a confederate who tendered life with his views than be in heaven for ever with a Northern copperhead. [Laughter and applause.] I respect you, and ever shall respect you, and I say to you, call on me when you want help, under the Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. RYAN. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes of the time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] have been occupied.

Mr. RYAN. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, and Mr. CANNON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desires to speak now, I will reserve my time.

Mr. CANNON. I should prefer to have the gentleman from West Virginia proceed, as there has just been a speech on this side of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. As no one seems desirous of speaking, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, rose.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio desire?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rose to take the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I suggest that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] be recognized in his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have not risen to go into a general discussion of the pension question. What modification should be made in the pension laws is a question which I did not suppose was coming up for discussion at this time when the single proposition before the House is a bill appropriating $75,000,000 to pay pensions for the coming year. Such bills, my experience has been, have gone through this House almost without debate and almost without opposition.

But to-day the opportunity has been taken to drag politics into the debate on a pension appropriation bill and to arraign certain officials. Now, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] arraigns the present Commissioner of Pensions for a statement made in his report, and claims that it is without foundation in fact, I call his attention to what the country well knows, and that is that the late Commissioner of Pensions during the last Presidential and Congressional election left his place in the Pension Office—left his high seat as judicial officer in the Pension Department—and went to the State of Ohio to take charge of the political campaign, and there remained for five or six weeks, in charge of the Republican campaign in that State, all the time holding on to his office and drawing his salary as Commissioner of Pensions.

Not only did the Commissioner go to Ohio to take charge of the Republican campaign, but officers under him were sent out to that State and to other States to do similar work. My friend from Cincinnati [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] knows what some of them went there for.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do very well. I know they went to counteract the performance of a pack of scoundrels there.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My friend from Cincinnati knows very well what they went there for; he knows they went there to help in the Republican campaign while drawing pay from the United States Treasury. Some of them were sent elsewhere, ostensibly on duty connected with the office, but in fact to do political work. It is well known in the State of Ohio that the late Commissioner of Pensions increased the number of special examiners and special agents in that State just before the October election. My own district had some six or eight sent into it just before the election. In other districts, safely Democratic, there were only one or two, or the usual number. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but it is well known that the late Commissioner, as chairman of the campaign committee in Ohio, employed by the hundred men who went all over that State, into every county and township in the State and into every school district, to do political work. I do not say any of this class were paid out of the pension fund or any money appropriated by Congress, but out of the campaign fund provided for the election in that State.

These agents represented themselves as in the employ of Mr. Dudley, the Commissioner of Pensions. They hunted up soldiers who were applicants for pensions, and wherever they found a Democratic applicant they pursued him to his home and told him if he voted the Democratic ticket he need not expect to have his pension allowed. They represented themselves as coming from the Commissioner of Pensions, who had come to Ohio for the purpose of managing the campaign. They said they knew what they were talking about, and that if the applicants expected to get their pensions they must vote the Republican ticket. I am talking about what I know was represented.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not now. I am on the floor now for but very little time, and I can not yield.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Just for one question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Very well.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Do you think it was those pension agents in your district that had such a terrible effect upon your vote, or was it the fact that you did not vote for the bill to appropriate money to pay pensions? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, in reply to my colleague's question, I will inform him that I did vote for the bill appropriating money to pay pensions. I do not think there was a single vote against it on the floor of this House. I don't remember that there was. My colleague asked that question evidently without knowing the facts.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Did you vote for the Mexican pension bill after it came back from the Senate?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I most certainly did not, and I do not expect to vote for it if it comes up again in the same form. I shall vote for no bill that proposes, as that did, to grant to men who were merely borne on the roll fourteen days, who never left their States, or perhaps their counties, the same pensions that it allowed to men who served throughout the war and were wounded or disabled. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A more unjust proposition than that in my judgment never was presented in this Hall. I voted against it; I spoke against it everywhere in my district, and the people understand my position on that bill. So I shall vote against it again if it comes up again in that form or with the same provisions. So much for that.

I come back now to the main question, which is the prostitution of the Pension Office for political purposes under the late Commissioner of Pensions—not only the prostitution of his own high functions, but also the conduct of some of his subordinates. I say that those special agents of his, or who claimed to be, flooded every district and every township in the State of Ohio before our October election—I do not say with his knowledge; I have no right to say that; but presumably so, because of the position he took in that campaign; they went all over the State, telling the soldiers that they must vote the Republican ticket or else their pensions would not be allowed, and if they were drawing pensions that they would lose them.

Why, Mr. Chairman, there is scarcely a Democratic soldier in my district who can not testify to this thing. Not only by such agents, but by Republicans generally who engaged in political work was this done; it was the common stock in trade in the campaign; and I think they were justified in assuming what they did by the position which the Commissioner himself took when he abandoned his high official position and went out to Columbus to take charge of the campaign for the Republican party.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask the gentleman to yield for a question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The charges which the gentleman has made in regard to the use of the Pension Office for political purposes are broad and sweeping.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am aware of that, because the facts are broad and sweeping.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he has any proof in an authentic form of the statement he has made?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There are plenty of witnesses. I myself know of many of these things.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman give us his specific authority?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman knows, does he not, that General Dudley was managing the Republicans in Ohio? Let me state further that the Commissioner, as I am now advised, had his office at Columbus in the office of the agent for paying pensions. I know that he sent out telegrams all over the State; at least he sent a great many into my district, some of which were intercepted and shown to me, disclosing exactly what he was doing.

Now, I will say to my friend from Michigan, I never have charged that these political agents were sent out by Commissioner Dudley. I say they so represented themselves. Many of them were strangers. Nobody knew them. They found out the soldiers, followed them to their homes; and soldiers and their friends came to me and told me what had been told them. I was told—I am not telling any secrets—by Republicans on the stump that these men were not really pension agents, but were political agents sent out by General Dudley at the head of the campaign committee, and were paid out of the campaign funds. That, I think, is correct. I believed it then, and I believe it now

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Why did you not say that in immediate connection with the charge?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I did.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You have just said these men were wholly unauthorized, as you have been advised, yet the statement you made before implied that they were sent out by the Pension Office.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My colleague is mistaken. I said they claimed to come from Mr. Dudley. I said that I did not know whether he sent them or not. I only know what they claimed. The six or eight special examiners or special pension agents I spoke of were a different class; they were sent from the Pension Office.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The gentleman should not have disconnected the two statements.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The fact that Mr. Dudley left his place here in Washington and went to Columbus to take charge of the campaign there, still holding his office—for he resigned to take effect at a certain time, really depending on the result of the election—is evidence enough to me. I do not want any other evidence as to what he was doing and was willing to do in that campaign.

The fact that General Dudley, holding the office of Commissioner of Pensions, was willing to leave his duties here and go into a State of which he was not a citizen, with which he had no political relations, and there take charge of a political campaign, is all the evidence I want that he was ready to do all the other things charged against him. And such a prostitution of high official position I do not believe can be found in any other case in the records of this country, and I hope it never will be repeated.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman name any of these political agents besides General Dudley?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Rathbone was one.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman name another?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I could name a good many, for I made some investigation into this matter.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Let us have them all.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. As a gentleman near me suggests, "their name is legion." The class of political agents I have referred to could be found in every township and every school district—in my part of the State at any rate.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Then it ought to be easy to name more than one.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. These men were strangers to me, but they were there, and I say they were supported by Republicans who were engaged in political work in that canvass in their representations to soldiers that if they voted the Democratic ticket they would never get their pensions. That was said so many times that it became an old story. The soldiers were told that their claims for pensions would not depend upon their service for their country, would not depend upon scars or wounds or disability, but upon whether they supported the Republican party or not. This is the way pensions were mixed up with politics in that Dudley campaign in Ohio.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Now, will the gentleman allow me one more question on that point?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My friend is so good-natured that I must yield to him.

Mr. CUTCHEON. About 531,000 invalid pensions have already been granted; and all of them, except those granted since the 4th of March last, have been granted under Republican Commissioners. Does the gentleman claim that these 531,000 pensioners are all Republicans?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Oh, no. No such claim is made.

Mr. CUTCHEON. About half are Democrats.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will go further; I will go so far as to say I do not think the question of politics has determined the allowance of pensions generally. I only talk things that take place about election times, and especially the election two years ago when General Dudley went to Ohio to manage the campaign. When they thought there was something to be gained by this course they did attempt to connect the allowance of pensions with politics, and for that purpose the Commissioner left his place in the Pension Office and went out to Ohio. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Did he not file his resignation before he went?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But he drew his pay all the time and communicated all the time with the Pension Office. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He was in frequent communication with the office, and during that time some question arose between him and the deputy commissioner, Mr. Clarke, as to who had authority, He claimed to have authority notwithstanding the fact that he left the Pension Office to go to Ohio to manage a political campaign. His resignation could have been easily enough recalled if Blaine had been elected. That is the impartial management of that office under the Commissioner to which the gentleman from Iowa referred.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Take the examining boards, the boards of surgeons who pass upon questions of disability. I do not say there were not Democrats who were members of such boards under the former Commissioners, but so far as I know there was no Democrat on any examining board in my district. When the present Commissioner came in I advised as a measure of simple justice that there should be at least one man of the opposite party on every examining board in the country. The present Commissioner in this way has constituted all his examining boards.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let me correct the gentleman. It is only fair to state that in Iowa on every one of the examining boards there was a Democrat.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Iowa then must have been an exception, for I do not know of any in Ohio. Certainly there was none in my district. I should like to have the gentleman tell us what Democrat was on the examining board in Keokuk.

Mr. SOWDEN. There were no Democrats appointed on examining boards in Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Permit me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly. I always yield.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to ask whether the absence of Republican pension examiners accounted for the remarkable gains achieved in Hamilton County last year?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I refer to the election two years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will suspend for one moment until the Clerk reads Rule IV, clause 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. When any member desires to speak or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise and respectfully address himself to "Mr. Speaker," and, on being recognized, may address the House from any place on the floor or from the Clerk's desk, and shall confine himself to the question under debate, avoiding personalities.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has had that provision of the rules read for the purpose of suggesting to members when they are disposed to interrupt the member occupying the floor that if they will address the Chair much less confusion will result than under the present system of members interrupting the occupant of the floor without his consent and without addressing the Chair.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have been asked what reduced the vote in my district. Just these agencies and the misrepresentations made to the soldiers, who believed, as hundreds have since said to me, that if they voted for me and for Cleveland for President it would be the last of their pensions. They were made to believe their pensions did not depend upon their services, wounds, or disability, but upon how they voted. That, I say, was constantly and persistently put before them in campaign documents and by such agencies as I have referred to everywhere. My colleagues all know this. My case was not exceptional.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask the gentleman from Ohio if he thinks that is the measure of the intelligence of his constituents to believe anything of that kind?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Doubtless Democratic soldiers in my friend's district were told the same thing, and if they were told so by agents claiming to represent the Commissioner of Pensions they would be likely to believe it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How was it your district happened to be afflicted with so great a loss when other Democrats seemed to have gained during that memorable transaction?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I can give another reason for that. [Laughter.] There was a reduction of about five or six hundred, I think. Last year the district went Republican. It has gone Republican before. But the reason why there was so large a reduction was because more money was spent there to back up these agencies than in any other district in the State. [Applause.]

They seemed to be very anxious indeed for some reason to defeat me. Even my good friend and colleague on the other side came over and tried to help them do it. I do not think in doing so that he exactly represented the facts in the case; but nevertheless we have been good friends and I hope nothing will disturb that relation. He was doing service for his party and he always does that well.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I went over to explain some political inconsistencies into which my friend seemed to have fallen.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, my friend thought that I should have voted for the Mexican pension bill as it came back from the Senate with its load of amendments, as well as for some other matters about which we differed. Now my constituents seemed to think, after a review of the matter, that I was about right after all.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to admit that some of his Democratic constituents are purchasable with money?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to say in answer to the gentleman from Michigan that I have never known a district in which there were not some men who could be influenced by money.

It is, I admit, a sad state of affairs, and in this connection I will take occasion to say that in my opinion the most threatening danger that besets this country to-day comes from the use of money in connection with elections. [Applause.] Not less than $25,000, probably double that sum, was spent in my district—mostly a country district—to secure my defeat, and pension agents and General Dudley were doing all they could besides.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly. I will yield; I am in a yielding mood.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I entirely agree with the gentleman that the great danger confronting our institutions is the tendency to a plutocracy. It not only affects elections of representatives to Congress, but may I not ask my friend from Ohio if it is not suspected as having entered into legislative bodies to influence the election of United States Senators? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am afraid so; but let me assure my friend that if he will take the trouble to inquire about it he will find my record always against such influences; and he will find no apology anywhere from me for any such practices. I hold in abhorrence the use of money to control elections of any kind, and I have always denounced it and always shall denounce it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Let us now hear from the rest of the Ohio Democracy. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, I come back to the organization of the Pension Office. My friend from Iowa explains that two or three chiefs have been removed from the Pension Office.

There are something like two thousand, or perhaps a little less than two thousand, Government employés in that office. This is an enormous force for one office. It is an office, too, let me say, where politics never ought to be permitted to enter. Any Commissioner of Pensions who would permit a question relating to the politics of an applicant for a pension to be asked in that office would dishonor the office. The rights of soldiers to pensions do not depend upon their politics, and politics ought not to enter there any more than in a court of justice. Why, what would you think of a court of justice where rights of litigants were made to turn on their political affiliations, or where even a suggestion of a political nature was allowed? The Pension Office should be as far above political influence as any court of justice.

But, sir, to the organization of the Pension Office. There have been two or three removals, but it should be remembered that there are nearly two thousand persons employed—at least one thousand seven hundred or one thousand eight hundred altogether.

A MEMBER. How many are Democrats?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. How many are Democrats? I was told that out of nearly two thousand but sixty-eight—I believe that was the number—were Democrats and all the rest were Republicans. My information may not be exact, but I am not far out of the way; the great majority of them are Republicans. Now, I am free to say I think there ought to be some more removals. I think it due to the Democratic party and to the country that there should be more Democrats in that office. Instead of complaining of two or three removals, the real grounds of complaint I think are that there have not been a good many more removals. But I do not think that the present Commissioner of Pensions has permitted political questions to enter the office since he has been there.

Mr. FUNSTON. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER of Ohio. Oh, yes.

Mr. FUNSTON. I desire to ask the gentleman if he says that he is opposed to political questions entering there and that there ought not to be a political question raised, why there should be more Democrats there?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I want the office to be made non-partisan by putting partisans out—by putting out men whose sole recommendation for appointment was the fact they were zealous partisans. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. And by putting in partisans on the other side. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FUNSTON. Of course that is the logic.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. To be non-partisan both parties should be indiscriminately there. It should be divided fairly between the parties, which is not the case now. Let me remind my friend that the one qualification essential to secure an appointment there under Republican administrations—I do not say the only qualification, but the essential qualification was, was he a good Republican? Was he a zealous member of his party and a good political worker? In many cases I apprehend no other question was asked. Now, I want to free the Pension Office from this abuse.

Mr. CURTIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIN. If the offices are not partisan and you do not put partisans out and partisans in, what is the use of holding an election? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My distinguished friend from Pennsylvania has presented the Flanagan enigma again. He asks what are we here for? But on that point I will define my position at any rate. I believe such places as these, and above all others places in the Pension Office, ought to be non-partisan. This service should be non-partisan. But we do not make it so by keeping only Republicans in, men who were appointed solely because they were active political workers in the Republican party. I believe in letting such partisans step down and out. We require all who enter this non-partisan service to go in through the non-partisan gateway—the Civil Service Commission. Why should not all be treated alike?

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. Is the gentleman aware that the present Commissioner of Pensions has kept Republican members of Congress standing in the ante-room while he was conferring with Democratic members as to who should be discharged?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have not heard that and I do not see how that could well be, for there have not been any discharges. There are certain offices which I believe ought to be changed with every change of administration. Every head of a Department, bureau, or division ought to be changed and made harmonious with the administration. I believe that the men occupying such places ought to be in sympathy with the administration and in harmony with its policy. As to the places that are merely ministerial, let them be made non-partisan by putting out those who were appointed solely because they were partisan, or at any rate require all to go through the same ordeal to stay as to get in. In other words, make the service non-partisan by putting all on the same footing. Give Democrats at any rate an equal chance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to one other thing, and I will then take my seat. I desire to make one remark in justice to the present Commissioner of Pensions; and that is, that I have heard no complaint from any soldier from any part of the country that there has been any partisanship in decisions rendered on pension claims; and instead of there being no pensions allowed, as the soldiers were told, there have been more pensions allowed upon their merits, and on the evidence presented, under the present administration of that office than were ever allowed in the same time under any other administration of this office. I am certainly borne out by the facts in this statement.

When I came in here to vote for this pension bill, to vote to appropriate seventy-five millions to pay pensions for the coming year, I did not expect to have anything to say or that there would be any discussion on the bill at all further than to explain the appropriation. I am in favor of extending the provisions of the pension laws so as to embrace all soldiers who are now disabled, if they have a military record that justifies the presumption that their disability is due to their service. I say such soldiers are entitled to pensions as much as they were when in the service to their pay. But that is a very different proposition from putting everybody on the pension-list at the same rate, whether he performed service or not and whether in any way disabled or not.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to leave the arena of bitter partisan politics for a moment to assume the safer ground of history and truth. I was unwilling that the sun should go down without making the statement I desire now to submit.

I became chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for the Forty-fourth Congress. I acted in that position during the first session of that Congress. I was Speaker for five years, and then again became a member of the Appropriations Committee for a Congress, and again chairman of that committee for the last Congress, and I am now chairman; and I desire to say this is the first time that I have known of partisan politics and sectionalism being introduced in connection with the debate upon this bill. [Applause.] I would perhaps have remained silent notwithstanding, except that, whether intended or not, there might go abroad to the country the impression that the Democratic party, and more particularly the Southern element—who I call by name the confederates of our party—have in any way shown any hostility whatever to any of the bills for the payments of pensions during the whole of that period. And when the effort was made, whether intended or not, to make a record against these gentlemen because they exercised their own choice in voting as to the amount that should go to the widows—when the effort was made to send that to the country as evidence of hostility to the payment of pensions, I could not sit here and submit to such an imputation on those gentlemen without contradiction. On the contrary, my experience has shown me that they have displayed a wonderfully generous disposition and full-heartedness in every particular whenever pensions to Union soldiers or the widows of Union soldiers were involved. I now and here place my experience against the impression that might be made, whether intended or not, by the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] that there is on that side any hostility from any quarter of this country represented on this side to the payment of what is justly due to those who were disabled and to the dependents on those who fell in the war for the Union. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRISON. In all the years of the war, and the nearly ten years following immediately after it, our friends on the other side of the House politically had control of the Government in all its branches. They are skilled alike in statecraft, in manifestation of mindful care for the soldier of the late war, and in display of patriotism. In all these years certainly they would not fail to busy themselves in making the most ample provision for the soldiers by providing them with suitable and ample pensions and allowances of every kind. Since then, in the dozen or more years I have had the honor of serving here, no Southern man ever failed to vote, at least I do not remember the name of a Southern man who ever failed to vote for the last dollar that in the long years of watchful care and much law-making the Republican party had provided by law should be paid to the soldier. [Applause.] If any gentleman knows of a Southern man who has ever failed to vote the last dollar recommended by the Republican Commissioner of Pensions to keep faith with the soldier and to pay him all our Republican friends had declared to be his due and provided by law should be paid, I would like to know the name of that Southern man. What is his name?

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir; I have said all I care to say.

Mr. HAMMOND. My question is, Who fixed the rate of the widows' pension at $8 a month? What party fixed it?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If my colleague will allow me, I will say that the Republican party during the war, and when they had power in both Houses of Congress, fixed the rate of pension for the Union soldiers.

Mr. HAMMOND. My question is, Who fixed these widows' pensions which it is now sought to have raised?

Mr. MORRISON. I do not know that I can answer that question positively. I do not now recollect whether this rate of $8 was fixed before or since the late war. Whenever fixed, it so remained. It is not yet above $8.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a single word now, more in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] than anything else, and then I shall reserve the balance of my time until to-morrow. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that in his long experience as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and as Speaker of this House he never before had witnessed a political discussion upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; upon a pension bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I said upon the annual pension appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. Then, Mr. Chairman, if that is what the gentleman said, I will say in reply that, as I understand the facts, the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] was provoked by the misinformation obtained by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations from the Commissioner of Pensions and sent out by him or some one else to the country.

Mr. RANDALL. I was not dealing in little matters, as to who was hurt or who was not hurt. I spoke of history.

Mr. CANNON. I say the speech of the gentleman from Iowa was provoked by the information obtained by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations from the Commissioner of Pensions and sent broadcast over the country, stating the cost of the arrears act as proposed would be $80,000,000 more than it would be in fact even from his own premises, for the purpose of shaping the policy not only of that committee, but of the Committee on Pensions, touching the proposed legislation, and I think unfairly alarming the country upon the question of cost of the repeal of the limitation of the arrears-of-pension act.

Mr. RANDALL. I will reply to that.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to indorse what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has said, and to state that his utterances in exposing that misstatement, which most of the people of the country probably believe to be true, was apt and timely; but although the misstatement is exposed the truth will not overtake it, as truth in such a case never does overtake error.

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer the gentleman in that particular. No man in this House was more surprised at the figures developed than I was. But, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I felt, of my own motion, that it was my duty to inquire what would be the cost of this legislation, because I remembered that on a former occasion $75,000,000 was stated as likely to be the cost of the arrears bill, and I knew that up to the present time it had cost $176,000,000. My inquiry, therefore, was made as a mere matter of precaution, but I of course stand by what I did. I did my duty regardless of the facts developed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] allow me to make a statement here in defense of the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. CANNON. I would prefer just now to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and yield to my colleague from Illinois afterward. The gentleman from Pennsylvania saw his duty clear, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to travel outside of the legitimate jurisdiction conferred upon that committee by the rules and the order of the House, to get a statement from the Commissioner of Pensions which was not correct, and which has gone broadcast over the country.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not responsible for its incorrectness.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], on the other hand, saw his duty clear in the consideration of this bill in the greater committee, the Committee of the Whole House, having jurisdiction of this and all other matters of a kindred nature, to correct that mistake before the House and the country. So I think the gentleman from Iowa was strictly within the line of duty. One word further. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] said that this was the first time that he had witnessed a political discussion upon a pension appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. So far as I could remember.

Mr. CANNON. Now there is a rule in pleading that a demurrer is carried back to the first faulty pleading, and the gentleman's objection, if legitimate objection it be, would probably travel back through the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] and lodge upon the devoted head of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], who stood in his place here for several minutes glorifying the present Commissioner of Pensions, and adroitly, as his speech will show, seeking to sing the praises of his side of the House and to excuse their shortcomings.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] allow me to say that I am not engaged in singing the praises of any party or of any section in connection with this subject. I rose simply to do justice and state truth. As to the information I sought, it was my duty to inquire about these matters. For what I did I make no apology at all, and the gentleman does not understand the subject properly if he does not know that even though the Committee on Invalid Pensions should recommend this legislation and pass it through the House, yet it would still remain for the Committee on Appropriations to recommend to the House the appropriations necessary to execute the law.

The bill to increase the pensions of widows has not become a law, but if it should, then the Committee on Appropriations will have to recommend to this House the appropriation of a sufficient sum to carry that law into effect, which will be about $6,166,000. So that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is quite wrong in supposing that I was in the least degree outside of the strict line of duty.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but, under the revised rules, that committee has power to do one thing only, namely: to report the appropriations in pursuance of existing law; it has no power to report legislation touching pensions or anything else. And, while I do not seek to criticise him further than to defend the gentleman from Iowa, if he needs any defense, I do say, as the gentleman from Iowa said, that this action, if apt at all, would have come with greater propriety from my colleague from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON], which committee reports and recommends legislation to levy taxes and raise revenues to pay pensions and carry on the Government.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has never heard me utter a complaint or a grumble about the duties of the Committee on Appropriations, whether in their present condition or formerly.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in reply to my colleague from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON]. An able and adroit man is my colleague. [Laughter.] No man on either side of the House admires him for his ability and personal qualities more than I do. In order to avoid the force of the point made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], in speaking of the vote that was had at this session of Congress (the record of which was read at the Clerk's desk on the passage of the widows' pension bill, showing the solid vote of Southern Democrats against it), my friend from Illinois failed to make any answer to that, but sought to avoid its effect by saying that in all his experience his Democratic friends had voted every time to make appropriations to pay pensions in pursuance of existing law.

That is doubtless true, for I understand that everybody on both sides has done that. But that did not meet the charge made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON]. His statement was from the record that on the bill to pass the act increasing the widows' pension and that of dependent parents from eight to twelve dollars a month the vote against it came solidly from the Southern Democrats, except the gentlemen from New York [Mr. HEWITT] and Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG], which showed sectionalism in the gentleman's party friends from the South.

I might go further in the proof of that sectionalism and demonstrate that during the first and second sessions of the last Congress, with a Democratic majority of 70 to 80 in the House, almost the identical sectional force upon that side stood day after day and night after night availing themselves of the rules of the House, filibustering against the consideration of provisions which had been passed by a Republican Senate to put every soldier who had been honorably discharged after three months' service and is now disabled and dependent upon his labor for support upon the pension-roll without further proof. True, my colleague [Mr. TOWNSHEND] stood during those days and nights, as we all remember so well, lifting up his voice and crying aloud for the passage of that bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But it was "the voice of one crying in the wilderness."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, when that side of the House, with its 70 or 80 majority, was reminded in the last Congress that the House made the rules and could unmake them, that they had the power, with the aid of our side of the House, to so amend the rules as to cut off dilatory motions and pass that bill as it came from the Senate, my colleague from Illinois and Northern Democrats were silent.

I stand ready now so far as this question of pensions is concerned to welcome my colleague [Mr. TOWNSHEND] into the Republican party, provided he will come over and stay with us until the battle is fought through, and provided further, that after this desirable pension legislation fails—for it is liable to fail in this Congress as it did in the last and through the same means—he will not go home and get upon the stump and say "great is Democracy!" and quote his own sayings here in favor of this legislation to cover up and excuse the shortcomings of his party friends.

Mr. Chairman, it will not be the fault of the Republican side of the House if these measures fail to pass.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope my colleague will now yield to me for a few words in reply.

Mr. CANNON. I have promised to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said about the entire willingness of our friends on the other side always to make ample appropriations in pursuance of law in those Congresses presided over by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and controlled by Democratic committees. I desire to call attention to a bill which we were compelled to pass at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress—a bill providing:

That to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for Army pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the sum of $16,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The previous Congress had adjourned without making ample appropriations for the pensioners; and one of the first duties that we were called upon to discharge when the Forty-seventh Congress met was to supply the deficiency that had been created by a lack of appropriation on the part of the preceding Congress. I remember further, that it was in pursuance of a grand political scheme——

Mr. MORRISON. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. HISCOCK. A great political scheme by which we were compelled to provide for thirty or forty millions of deficiencies in the Post-Office Department and in other Departments, $16,000,000 being for pensions. These deficiencies were added to the sum total of appropriations which we were compelled to make in order to raise the charge that the Republican party was extravagant.

Mr. RANDALL. All that the gentleman says can not move me from my position that the $16,000,000 appropriation to which he refers related to a deficiency resulting from miscalculation as to the amount to be paid under the arrears bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. That has always been the trouble, Mr. Chairman, "miscalculation."

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; if I recollect aright, and I think I do, we appropriated at that time, as on other occasions, both for the current pension-roll and for the arrears, the entire sum that was asked by the officers of the Government belonging to the Republican party.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The matter was discussed; and it was said, "If we do not appropriate enough, a Republican Congress will be in session before there will be any necessity to expend the money, and they can appropriate it." Instead of the sum being charged to the Democratic party, it was charged to us. We were compelled to make the appropriation or there would have been no money in the Treasury to answer the drafts made on behalf of the pensioners. Sixteen millions of dollars! There could be no mistake of arithmetic in reference to so large a sum as that—nearly one-quarter of the whole bill. So far as that item is concerned, it is reported by the committee on this bill; yet a Democratic committee reported a bill—we could protest against it, of course—reported a bill embracing an aggregate appropriation which any arithmetical calculation would have demonstrated was insufficient for the needs of the service.

Mr. RANDALL. Admitting what the gentleman says to be true—it is not true, but admitting it for the sake of argument—his statements do not detract from the disposition on this side of the House at all times to give the entire sums shown to be necessary for the pensioners.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will not undertake to say that gentlemen on the other side expected to cheat the pensioner out of his pension; but they were willing to use the appropriations for that service, as for every other, for political purposes. Their position was, "We will create a deficiency in the pension appropriation, and in the Post-Office Department, and all along the line, so that when the Republican party shall come into power they shall find that insufficient appropriations have been made for the service of the Government; that the Government will be starved unless they will provide for these deficiencies." The sum-total of all those deficiencies, amounting to between thirty and forty million dollars, we were compelled to appropriate for; and the cry upon the stump during the ensuing canvass was "Republican extravagance!" And this cry was based upon the large appropriations we were compelled in this way to make for these different branches of the service.

Mr. CANNON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to say a word in this debate until the discussion shifted round to something which very decidedly interests me and has interested me during all my experience in this House. I venture the assertion that in this House the appropriations for the Government have too often been brought here not with reference to the needs of the country, but with reference to political speeches to be made after the adjournment of Congress.

My friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has touched only on one phase, I think—that is, the making of appropriation bills not to meet the needs of the country, but known to be, and mathematically demonstrable to be, inadequate to the necessary expenditures of the Government, and all for the purpose of concealing by a deficiency bill the actual expenditures of the country under a Democratic appropriation committee; and the last Congress witnessed the culmination of this abuse. At the last Congress appropriations were deliberately carried through this House which were not sufficient for the purposes of this Government, and which were shown on this floor not to be sufficient under existing laws, because they knew on the other side that the Republican Senate would have to make the necessary additions to carry out and execute the laws of the country. Thereupon immediately the large Democratic newspapers made contrast between Democratic economy and Republican extravagance, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] made his annual procession across the country with his budget of figures, explaining how economical he had been and consequently what a saving he was to the country. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, we witnessed that thing in the House in one particular instance, when the House entirely overthrew the Post-Office appropriation bill as presented by the committee, then under the able leadership of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. The House made the appropriations which were needed, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania came back, like a distinguished military chieftain during the war from some Winchester or other, and carried the whole Democratic side of the House against appropriations which were made in accordance with law, and against the very appropriations which the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the Democratic side of the House had to vote for in the final results of the bill. But they did it with a complaint, a dismal groan heard all over the country that they were forced to do it by the wicked and expensive Republican Senate, when they did it in accordance with law, when they did it because they had to, when they did it because they knew they would do it from the very time when the bill came before the House. [Applause.]

I do hope, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes his next pilgrimage and combines economy with the science and practice of protection [laughter] that some knowledge of the exact condition of things may penetrate the country, so that budget of tabular statements may fall where it belongs—to the ground. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RANDALL. A word in reply.

Mr. CANNON. Let me know how much.

Mr. RANDALL. I will give you a portion of my time.

Mr. CANNON. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-eight minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I can afford to be good-natured.

Mr. CANNON. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RANDALL. Only one moment or two will be necessary to answer what has been said. I wish to state that I have here the official Book of Estimates for the year to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has alluded. I find there that the Republican departmental estimates for the year 1882 were $50,000,000, and that there was appropriated for that year $50,000,000, just as I stated. The deficiency of $16,000,000 was subsequently appropriated.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RANDALL. You have made your statement, and I will not take long to answer it. [Laughter.]

So far as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is concerned I only want to say this, That the appropriations last year were made, as they always have been made, under the rule of the party to which I belong, as close as possible to the requirements of the Government. I remember very well on a former occasion, years ago when there was an enormous reduction, that a Republican Secretary of the Treasury informed us, notwithstanding that heavy reduction, we might have gone $11,000,000 deeper. Last year the appropriations were very carefully estimated and appropriated for, and I find the deficiencies now presented are only about $3,000,000. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. REED, of Maine. Under the action of the Republican Senate—that answers the gentleman. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RANDALL. Not in the least. The Senate is not the sole body in control of this Government. This House is a co-ordinate branch of the Government.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Only one?

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to hear what the gentleman has to suggest as to another beside the Senate.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman whether they do not have two co-ordinate branches. I understood him to say they had only one.

Mr. RANDALL. I said this House was a co-ordinate branch. We have the Senate, the Executive, and the House. I know of no other.

Mr. MORRISON. And a useless judge or two. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCKINLEY. I understood the gentleman to say his party had one branch of the Federal Government.

Mr. RANDALL. I have repeated what I said.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I protest against this interruption, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I thought, was about to answer me.

Mr. RANDALL. I only wanted to answer the statement of the gentleman from Maine by giving the House the true statement of the case. I do not mean of course to say that the gentleman stated anything untrue.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Of course you did not.

Mr. HISCOCK. A single word, Mr. Chairman, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that we appropriated the full amount that came to us in the annual estimates of the Departments for the last year. Now, I am clear, and associates of mine who are now and were upon the committee then will bear me out in the assertion, that subsequent investigation proved that that amount would be insufficient.

The subcommittee delegated to investigate the question came to the conclusion that it was insufficient, but the result was that these $16,000,000 were not appropriated. There were scant appropriations in the Post-Office service and scant appropriations all along the line, and solely for the purpose that the Democracy might in the fall go to the country upon the economical appropriations, and that the next year, when we were compelled to go to the country, they might point to the aggregate of our appropriations and institute a comparison between ourselves and the appropriations made by a previous Congress. We felt the full force of that argument, and thirty-two millions, I think, in the aggregate—I have already had occasion heretofore in this House to point to the items—but thirty-two millions in the aggregate we were compelled to provide for which should have been provided for by the last Democratic House of Representatives.

Mr. CANNON. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman from Maine will wait until to-morrow, so that I can now move that the committee rise.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no; let us pass the bill to-night.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I shall occupy but a little time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is recognized.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I want to direct the attention of the committee to one point which has been raised in this debate, and that is with reference to the suggestion that heretofore there has never been anything known like partisan discussion or partisan lines being drawn upon a pension appropriation bill.

I find in a political manual of a single year, which has been handed me, two or three illustrations of the fallacy of that statement. For instance, in 1879, on the 1st day of March, in the other branch of Congress, pending the consideration of a bill making appropriation to carry out the provisions of the arrears act of January 25, 1879, an amendment was offered making the law granting pensions to soldiers and widows of the war of 1812, applicable to soldiers and sailors of the war with Mexico, to which the following amendment was moved:

Provided further, That no person who served in the confederate army during the late war of the rebellion, or held any office, civil or military, in the late confederacy, shall be entitled to receive a pension under this act.

On the vote upon the adoption of that provision there was a solid Republican vote of 24 and a negative vote of 26 solidly Democratic, with the exception of one Senator from Florida and one from South Carolina.

On the same day the following amendment was offered to the same provision.

Mr. SOWDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I can not yield. I have but three minutes.

Pending the consideration of a provision making the law pensioning the soldiers and widows of soldiers of the war of 1812 applicable to the soldiers and sailors of the war with Mexico an additional amendment was offered, as follows:

Provided further, That no pension shall ever be paid under this act to Jefferson Davis, late president of the so-called confederacy.

Upon that amendment the division, as might naturally be supposed, was strictly upon party lines, the vote being 23 Republicans in favor of the amendment and 21 Democrats and 1 Republican from South Carolina against it.

Again, on the 19th day of June, 1878, when the arrears-of-pension bill was under consideration in the House, I find that the vote recorded stood 164 in the affirmative and 61 solid compact Democratic votes in the negative. I am unable to state on which side of that question the sympathies of the gentleman from Pennsylvania were enlisted, as he is not recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me answer that by saying that it only confirms the truth of my statement. The provision in question and the debate upon it had no reference whatever to an annual pension appropriation bill. It was the Mexican pension bill and the amendments to it, and not an annual bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg pardon; the previous votes in the Senate were upon amendments to an appropriation bill which had been regularly reported from the House Committee on Appropriations and passed by the House.

Mr. RANDALL. And I submit that the House has nothing whatever to do with the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Let me ask the gentleman from Maine if he wants the House to adopt all the bad precedents of the Senate?

Mr. BOUTELLE. And in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will say that I was talking of the general purposes of the bills in question to show how the parties in Congress stood upon them.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. CANNON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BROWNE.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not care to continue the discussion in the line in which it seems to be progressing now. I regret as much as any gentleman that this discussion has taken the course it has taken; but I am not willing that this afternoon session should close without saying one word upon the subject that was brought so prominently to the attention of the House and the country by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

The late Commissioner of Pensions is my constituent and my personal and political friend. When the charge that has been preferred against him by the present Commissioner of Pensions appeared in his report General Dudley demanded a full, free, and true examination of these charges, and that question is now, if I am correctly informed, pending before a committee of the Senate.

I want to say here if the gentleman from Ohio can name any one reputable man living now who was commissioned by General Dudley to interject politics into the consideration of a pension claim, or to use it for the purpose of influencing any vote, I will right in this presence here denounce him as unworthy of the confidence of any people or any party.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I made no such charge.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman from Ohio intended this country should understand that the ex-Commissioner of Pensions let loose an army corps of his agents in his district and other districts in Ohio and the Northwest for the purpose of influencing the vote of pension claimants by representing to them or telling them that unless they voted in a particular way their pensions would not be granted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know of instances where it was done.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to appear before the Senate committee and give the names of such persons to be examined under oath, and I will undertake to say they are either disreputable scoundrels if they so testify or that they have committed willful and corrupt perjury.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No, sir; some of them are as honorable men as you are, and as good soldiers as you were.

The CHAIRMAN rapped to order, and requested Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, to suspend his remarks until the House should come to order.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No man on this floor representing any constituency has a higher personal or moral character than General Dudley. And I want to say more than that: He, unlike some of his traducers, went from the beginning of the war under the shadow of that flag and testified his devotion to his country by leaving his good right leg on the battlefield at Gettysburg. Do not assail him by innuendo. Do not come in the presence of this House and retail slanders that are unsupported by a single statement of fact. Do not tell things here that he is charged as having done without being frank enough to tell who are the witnesses by whom you propose to establish it. When a tribunal has been erected before which he has submitted his case for trial, I ask these his defamers to go there and present his case. I warrant it he will be vindicated by that tribunal as he is already vindicated by the country whose interest he has served. Before those who know him he needs no vindication.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What was Colonel Dudley doing in Ohio in 1884? For what did he leave the Pension Office?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Before he went to Ohio he notified the administration of his resignation as Commissioner of Pensions and proposed then to go out.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But he assumed to be Commissioner all the time and drew his pay as Commissioner.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is the rule of the Department to grant to every employé who resigns one month's pay after his resignation and they induced him to accept it——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Who did? The Republican party, not the country.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. With the knowledge that when he entered the Ohio campaign he never intended to return to his position, and during that time he had no official connection with the administration. If he went into the gentleman's district for the purpose of defeating him for Congress he could not have done the country a better service.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman has admitted the whole of my charge. He was there for just that purpose, but he did not succeed and the country did not approve of his being there and it did not make him governor.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a question of order. There is too much confusion in the Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask my colleague [Mr. CANNON] to yield to me for a motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. CANNON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1100) to amend the ninth section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885;

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Whereas the leases heretofore made of the bath-house and hot-water privileges upon the reservation of Government lands at Hot Springs, Ark., have expired by limitation of law; and

Whereas the Attorney-General of the United States has given an opinion that such leases may be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior without additional legislation;

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the opinion of Congress such leases of bath-house and hot-water privileges should not be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior unless the Forty-ninth Congress shall adjourn without having legislated with reference thereto.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 3829) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints to fill a vacancy on the Committee on Education Mr. WILKINS, in place of Mr. CURTIN, declined.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 1647) for the relief of Henry H. Wheeler, of Crook County, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1648) granting an increase of pension to William Collinsworth; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the joint resolution (H. Res. 71) authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension building.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 3829) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further routine morning business the Calendar is in order under Rule VIII, and the first case on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. In pursuance of the notice given by me, I ask that the Calendar may be laid aside for the purpose of enabling me to have taken up Senate bill 1483, what is known as the Chinese bill, for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the Calendar the Senator from Oregon asks that it be postponed and that the bill indicated by him be taken from the table for consideration. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HALE. I gave notice yesterday that at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], who was then entitled to the floor, I should move that the Senate go into executive session. The hour was so late when the Senator from Mississippi finished that I did not think it then advisable to attempt to interfere with the progress of the bill which was at that time before the Senate, but I wish to give notice now that at the end of the remarks of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] I shall make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

PROHIBITION OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill called up by the Senator from Oregon will be read by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1483) abrogating all treaties heretofore made and now operative between the United States Government and the Chinese Empire, in so far as they, or any of them, provide for, recognize, or permit the coming of Chinese to the United States, and in so far as they, or any of them, inhibit the United States from absolutely prohibiting the coming of Chinese to the United States; and repealing all acts of Congress, in so far as they, or any of them, recognize or permit the coming of Chinese to the United States; and absolutely prohibiting the coming of Chinese to the United States, excepting only diplomatic, consular, and other officers, and prohibiting the landing of any Chinese therein, excepting only such diplomatic or other officers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be regarded as before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Mr. President, nothing but the deepest sense of official duty and obligation to a devoted, generous, and deserving constituency could induce me at this early day in my term to obtrude myself on the attention of the Senate, and thus in a sense and to a certain degree violate that unwritten law of this body, so well understood but not always observed, in reference to the privileges of new members. I trust the importance and urgency of the questions involved, coupled with the fact of the peculiar and intimate relation they bear to the people of the State and coast I in part have the honor of representing, will justify me in doing that which under other circumstances might seem something of an impropriety.

It is a rule, recognized by physicians and surgeons, that desperate cases in medicine and surgery require heroic treatment; when the cancer is malignant and uncompromising, is making unrestrained inroads on the system and startling headway toward the vitals, all temporizing with narcotics, herbs, and palliatives must give way to the knife; and though the emergency and the means may compel the sacrifice of human blood in order to save human life, the ulcerous, devouring sore must, with all its cancerous roots, be cut from the body and cast away. So it is with the body-politic. When it is assailed by an extraordinary evil, menaced by an unyielding and rapidly advancing vice, which brings into grave and imminent peril not only the best interests of our people but the most cherished institutions of our country the time for temporizing has passed away; the more ordinary remedies must be put in the background, and the amenities which under other circumstances should be observed toward foreign powers and their subjects must upon the principle of self-preservation give way to such heroic and aggressive measures as the necessities of the case render absolutely essential. In the case under consideration such treatment seems necessary to the vindication of the most sacred rights and privileges of our people, the maintenance of our civilization, and the preservation of the domestic peace and tranquillity of the Republic.

Such an evil, a vice more terrible in its tendencies, more degrading in its influences than has been suggested, is to-day not merely paralyzing the rights of the laboring classes, not only absolutely destroying the interests of American labor in a large section of this country, not only fastening its fangs and exuding its leprous virus into the very vitals of the moral and physical being of our body-politic, and casting physical and moral infection on every side, but, worse than all this, absolutely disturbing the public peace, creating internal dissension and strife, and bringing into the most imminent peril the domestic tranquillity of our people, the Christian civilization of the age, and the general welfare of our nationality.

From such an evil are the people of the whole Pacific coast suffering to-day through the presence in their midst of large numbers of an unclean, non-assimilating, and pagan race. To such an infliction, national in its character, malignant and devilish in its tendencies, are they now subjected. Impending over them and gradually but surely extending its dominion eastward like a cloud of wrath, it imperils the rights of labor, of property, of peace, of life itself. To meet and successfully grapple with and finally subdue and eradicate from our land this dire scourge will require some more heroic treatment, some more vigorous remedy, some more emphatic measure, some firmer, more decided, and aggressive governmental step than has ever yet been taken by the American Congress or the Government of the United States through any of its departments or instrumentalities, and one, moreover, which never can be taken rightfully or properly and at the same time preserve inviolate the present existing treaty stipulations between the United States Government and the Chinese Empire, and such an one, moreover, which in my judgment we can not within any reasonable time hope to obtain through the treaty-making power by any further negotiations with the empire.

Hence it is that in the measure which I have submitted, and which is now under consideration, it is proposed that the States and the people of this Republic, as they constitutionally and of right may do, through their Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, with the approval of the Executive, or even by a sufficient vote of the Congress without his approval, remove those barriers that have for years stood in the way of Congress in the form of treaty stipulations, and which have restricted and prevented it from inaugurating the necessary measures and exercising the requisite powers to successfully deal with this momentous question—with this herculean evil.
